"We the gentlemen, justices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter-sessions of the peace at Maidstone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous estate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and considering that the fate of us, and our posterity, depends upon the wisdom of our representatives in parliament; think ourselves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable house the consequences, in this conjuncture, of your speedy resolutions and most sincere endeavour to answer the great trust reposed in you by our country.

"And in regard that, from the experience of all ages, it is manifest that no nation can be great or happy without union; we hope that no pretence whatever shall be able to create a misunderstanding among ourselves, or the least distrust of his most sacred majesty, whose great actions for this kingdom are writ in the hearts of his subjects, and can never, without the blackest ingratitude, be forgot.

"We most humbly implore this honourable house to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for; that your royal addresses may be turned into bills of supply; and that his most sacred majesty, whose propitious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue, may be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it is too late."

This petition, which was signed by the deputy-lieutenants of the county, several justices of the peace, and all the grand jury and other freeholders, was boldly delivered to the house of commons by David Polhill, William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, Justinian Champney, and William Hamilton, Esqrs. The house was immediately in a flame: the petition was voted to be a scandalous, insolent, and seditious libel, calculated to destroy the constitution of parliaments, and to subvert the established government of these kingdoms. It was, at the same time, ordered, that the five persons who had presented it to the house should be taken into custody.

This tyrannical exertion of power raised a great ferment in the nation, and the most indecent reflections were published against the Tories. Among the rest, a memorial appeared, signed Legion, against the house. "The English (said the memorialists) ought no more to be slaves to the parliament, than to the king." They promised to second him in all his measures, to set bounds to the exorbitant power of France; and concluded with this remarkable sentence, "Our name is Legion, and we are many." These complaints of the people were not unuseful to the king. The commons saw their error, and instantly altered their measures. They presented an address to his majesty, wherein they declared they would support him to the utmost; and desired him to engage in such alliances with the emperor, and other powers, as he should think necessary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They voted the sum of one million and a half for the public expences, thirty thousand seamen, and that ten thousand troops should be sent immediately to the assistance of the States-general.

The misunderstanding was, however, still so great between the two houses, that it was thought proper to put an end to the session of parliament. Accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of June, the king came to the house of peers; and having sent for the commons, they attended with their speaker, who, on presenting the money-bills, made the following speech to his majesty:

"Sir, it is with great joy and satisfaction that I attend your majesty at this time, since your commons have complied with all your majesty was pleased to desire at their meeting. They have passed the bill of succession, which has settled the crown in a protestant line, and continued the liberty of England, which your majesty hath settled and preserved. They have passed a bill for taking away those privileges which might have proved burdensome and oppressive to your subjects. They have given your majesty those supplies, which are more than ever were given in a time of peace, to enable your majesty, when you are abroad, to support your allies, procure either a lasting peace, or to preserve the liberties of Europe by a necessary war."

The king thanked both houses for the great zeal they had expressed for the public service, and their ready compliance with what he had recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the supplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preservation of Europe: and, after giving the royal assent to the bills presented to him, he put an end to the session.

The ten thousand auxiliaries, under the command of the earl of Marlborough, were ordered to embark immediately for Holland; and, after settling a regency, his majesty passed over to the continent, where he assisted at an assembly of the States. He told them in his speech, "That he always came into that country with joy, but especially in this dangerous conjuncture, because he foresaw his presence would be necessary for the service of the state: that he hoped to have passed the rest of his days in repose and peace, and to have left that state in a flourishing condition; but there had happened such great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that he knew not what might be the consequence: that he could, however, assure their High Mightinesses, that whether things were accommodated amicably, or whether they should be obliged to have recourse to arms, he persisted in the same zeal he ever had for their service and prosperity; and could declare, that the whole English nation were ready to assist the states, and strongly contribute towards their defence, and to whatever might tend to the common security."

The states, in their answer, which was equally affectionate, told his majesty, "That they could not omit to thank him for his assurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the English nation, in favour of themselves and the common cause, well knowing how much they might rely upon a people whose courage had gained so much reputation in the world, and were always of opinion that their interests were inseparable from those of England."

A treaty was soon after signed between the emperor, England and Holland, against France, for recovering the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria; and for the security of England and Holland, with regard to their commerce and navigation, and of the succession of the house of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, as well as a safe barrier to the Dutch.

Marlborough, who was not only at the head of the English army, but also appointed plenipotentiary to the states, soon convinced the world that his superior talents were equally adapted to war and negotiation, and rendered his appointment at once glorious to his prince and to himself. Prince Eugene had already begun the war in Italy, and shewed himself worthy of the great reputation he enjoyed.

Every method was now made use of, both by France and the allies, for increasing their forces by sea and land; but, perhaps, a declaration of war might might have been deferred till the next summer, if an accident had not happened which hastened the crisis. James II. paid the debt of nature at St. Germain on the sixteenth of September, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his exile. Lewis, who seemed to bid defiance to the several powers of Europe confederated against him, caused the son of the deceased prince to be declared king of England. He could not have taken a surer method to unite the English against him. It was in vain that he declared in a manifesto he published on this occasion, that he meant not to violate the treaty of Ryswick, or to disturb William in his possession of the crown. The English, already disposed for war, considered themselves as insulted, and breathed nothing but vengeance. The city of London, and most of the counties in England, transmitted addresses to his majesty in Holland, declaring their sense of the indignity offered him, and promising to support his government against the pretender and all his enemies.

The king returned to his British dominions on the fifth of November, and soon after the parliament was dissolved, and a new one appointed to meet on the thirtieth of December. The reason alledged for the dissolution of this parliament was, that his majesty might have the sense of the nation at this alarming conjuncture; but it is more than probable, that the chief inducement was that of preventing a revival of the heats and animosities between the two houses, as it was feared they might delay the supplies necessary for the approaching war.

The parliament met pursuant to the proclamation; and though the Whigs had gained an incontestible majority, yet Mr. Harley, who was considered as the leader of the tory party, was chosen speaker. The next day the king came to the house, and opened the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,
I promise myself you are met together, full of that just sense of the common danger of Europe, and the late proceedings of the French king which has been to fully and universally expressed in the loyal and seasonable addresses of my people.

"The owning and setting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the highest indignity offered to me and the nation, but does nearly concern every man who has a regard for the protestant religion, or the present and future quiet and happiness of his country, that I need not press you to lay it seriously to heart, to consider what future effectual means may be used for securing the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and extinguish the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and secret abettors.

"By the French king's placing his grandson on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppress the rest of Europe, unless speedy and effectual measures be taken. Under this pretence he is become the real master of the whole Spanish monarchy: he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and disposes of it as his own dominions; and by that means he has surrounded his neighbours in such a manner, that though the name of peace may be said to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniences of war.

"This must affect England in the nearest and most sensible manner, in respect to our trade, which will soon become precarious in all the various branches of it; in respect to our peace and safety at home, which we cannot hope should long continue; and in respect to that part which England ought to take in the preservation of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity with which the rest of Christendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded several alliances according to the encouragement given me by both houses of parliament, which I will direct shall be laid before you, and which, I doubt not, you will enable me to make good.

"There are some other treaties still depending, which shall likewise be communicated to you as soon as perfected.

"It is fit I should tell you the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament: All matters are at a stand till your resolutions are known, and therefore no time ought to be lost.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's blessing, to secure to you and your posterity, the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourselves, but will exert the ancient vigour of the English nation; but I tell you plainly my opinion is, if you do not lay hold of this occasion, you have no reason to hope for another.

"In order to do your part it will be necessary to have a great navy, and to provide for the security of our ships in harbour; and also that there be such a force at land, as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

"Gentlemen of the house of Commons;

"I do recommend these matters to you with that concern and earnestness which their importance requires: at the same time I cannot but press you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preserved, but by keeping sacred that maxim, that they shall never be losers who trust to parliamentary security.

"It is always with regret when I do ask aids of my people; but you will observe that I desire nothing which relates to any personal expence of mine: I am only desiring you to do all you can for your own safety and honour, at so critical and dangerous a time; and am willing that what is given should be wholly appropriated to the purpose for which it is intended.

"And since I am speaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before you, and also gave my assent to several bills for stating and examining the public accounts, that my subjects might have the satisfaction to know how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any other way or examination, that it may appear whether there have been any misapplications and mismanagements; or whether the debt that remains upon us has really arisen from the shortness of supplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you how necessary dispatch will be for carrying on that great public business, whereon our safety, and all that is valuable to us, depends. I hope what time can be spared will be employed about those other very desirable things I have recommended from the throne; I mean the forming some good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the suppression of vice.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of disputes and differences, and resolved to act with a general and hearty consent, for promoting the common cause, which alone can make this a happy session.

"I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could find you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy and fatal animosities, which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make all my subjects safe and easy as to any, even the highest offence committed against me.

"Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hopes of your enemies, by your unanimity. I have shewn, and will always shew, how desirous I am to be the common father of all my people. Do you, in like manner, lay aside parties and divisions: let there be no other distinction heard amongst us for the future, but of those who are for the protestant religion and the present establishment, and of those who wish for a popish prince and a French government.

"I will only add this, if you do in good earnest desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the protestant interest, it will appear by your rightly improving the present opportunity."

This truly patriotic speech was received by the nation with great applause. Both houses presented separate addresses of thanks to his majesty, but agreed in returning him thanks for his speech, and in assuring him that they would support his title and the protestant succession, and enable him to make good all his alliances for the preservation of the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France. These addresses were graciously received by his majesty, who expressed the satisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection. The whole nation in general were satisfied with these proceedings, and the utmost expedition was used in completing the armaments for carrying on the war with vigour, both by sea and land. Forty thousand men were voted for the sea service, and the same number to make up the complement of the army. The commons also voted, that whoever would advance or lend the sum of six hundred thousand pounds for the service of the fleet, and fifty thousand pounds for the present subsistence of the land-forces, should be paid the principal, with interest after the rate of six per cent. out of the first aids granted by parliament.

A. D. 1702. The behaviour of Lewis had so highly exasperated the nation, that both houses joined in an address to his majesty, beseeching him that no peace should be concluded with France till reparation was made to the king and the people by the French monarch. They prepared a bill of attainder against the pretender, James's son; and another, to oblige all persons in office to take an oath to maintain the established government, and the church of England, with a toleration for non-conformists. Ten peers protested against this bill, as appearing to them to impose a new obligation, as useless as it was severe.

William, now on very good terms with his parliament, was wholly employed in his great designs; and though threatened with approaching death, made preparations for the ensuing campaign, determined to put himself at the head of his army. But this he never accomplished. His life was drawing to a period, and an accident happened which hastened the melancholy event. His health had been, for some time, visibly declining; and he had retired to Hampton-Court, where he amused himself with his favourite diversions of riding and hunting. As he was taking the air on the twenty-first of February, in the park of Hampton-Court, he unfortunately fell from his horse, and broke his collar bone. He was immediately carried into the palace, where the bone was set, and he returned the same evening to Kensington. He seemed to be in a fair way of recovery, and on the fourth of March took several turns in the gallery; but being somewhat fatigued, he sat down on a couch, and fell asleep. He was soon after seized with a fever; and, notwithstanding all attempts to remove his complaint, the disorder continued to increase. He was sensible that his end was approaching, and met death with that firmness of mind which always distinguished him. "I know (said he to his physicians) that you have done every thing your art could do to assist me; but it is useless, and I submit." He continued sensible to the last moment, and died about eight in the morning of the eighth of March, in the fifty-first year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign.

William possessed not the amiable and attractive virtues. He had less sensibility than policy, and solicited popularity only occasionally. But he had merit sufficient to distinguish him from the generality of princes. He was a great general, and often gained more by a defeat than the French by a victory. He had inspired his troops with a confidence and courage that rendered them superior to all danger and bad success: and if his actions be fairly weighed in the balance of reason, we shall, perhaps, think his merit equal to most of the kings that ever filled the English throne. He was considered as a friend in whom the most unlimited confidence might be placed by most of the powers of Europe. He was indefatigable in business, and maintained the most inviolable attachment to his allies. Under the weight of labour, and in the languor of sickness, he contended with Lewis XIV. and humbled his prosperous power. He was the prop of Germany, and the support of the protestant religion. The English learned from him the strength of their maritime and commercial power. He governed Holland without despotism, but with a kind of absolute authority, founded wholly on confidence and esteem. These are circumstances more than sufficient to immortalize his memory. He was no friend to letters. Nursed in a camp, amidst the noise of battle, he imbibed not the amiable desire of being the patron of the muses. Had he been as attentive as Lewis XIV. to encourage genius, he would have enjoyed the same encomiums.

A N N E.

A. D. 1702. A N N E, princess of Denmark, second daughter of James II. ascended the English throne on the death of king William, pursuant to the act of settlement. The privy-council having been assembled during the late king's illness, waited on the princess immediately after his death, and recognized her title to the throne. She received them with the most engaging affability, expressed her sense of the great loss the nation had sustained, and of the heavy burden it brought upon herself in particular. But added, that the sincere regard she had to the religion and liberties of her country, would influence her to leave nothing undone on her part to preserve them inviolable, to maintain the succession in the protestant line, and the government as by law established. She also declared her resolution to carry on the preparations for opposing the exorbitant power of France; and that she would lose no time in giving her allies the strongest assurances, that she would pursue the true interest of England, together with that of the confederates, for the support of the common cause.

The whole nation promised themselves a long series of prosperity under the government of this beloved princess. Her irreproachable manners, the gravity of her disposition, and her firm attachment to the church, had already rendered her person dear to the people. The parliament, which, by virtue of an act passed in the late reign, continued sitting after the king's death, declared the princess Anne the lawful queen of these realms, and issued orders for proclaiming her, which was done with great solemnity. On the eleventh of March, the queen went to the house of peers with the usual solemnity, and delivered the following speech to the parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot too much lament my own unhappiness in succeeding so immediately after the loss of a king, who was the great support, not only of these kingdoms, but of all Europe: and I am extremely sensible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

"But the true concern I have for our religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the succession to the crown in the protestant line, and

and for the government in church and state as by law established, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promise myself will be successful by the blessing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection, of which you have given me so full assurance.

"The present conjuncture of affairs requires the greatest application and dispatch; and I am very glad to find in your several addresses so unanimous a concurrence in the same opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

"I cannot but think it very necessary, upon this occasion, to desire you to consider of proper methods towards obtaining an union between England and Scotland, which has been so lately recommended to you as a matter that very nearly concerns the peace and security of both kingdoms.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I need not put you in mind, that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

"I rely entirely upon your affections for supplying it in such a manner as shall be most suitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It shall be my constant endeavour to make you the best return for that duty and affection you have expressed to me by a careful and diligent administration for the good of all my subjects: and as I know my own heart to be entirely English, I can very sincerely assure you, there is not any thing you can expect or desire from me, which I shall not be ready to do for the happiness and prosperity of England; and you shall always find me a strict and religious observer of my word."

Pleased with this speech from the throne, both houses joined in a warm address of thanks to her majesty; and on the fourteenth of March, they voted, that the same revenue which had been settled on king William, should be settled on her majesty during her life. The queen lost no time in informing her allies of her resolution to pursue the measures of his late majesty. She wrote a letter to the states-general, assuring them that they should find the same readiness to pursue the measures for preserving the common liberties of Europe, as they would had the life of the late king been extended to a much longer date. Animated by these assurances, the states renewed their applications to the necessary business for carrying on the war with vigour; and published the queen's letter, to refute the reports that had been artfully raised by the enemy, that the queen would not pursue the measures concerted by king William and the confederates. Marlborough arrived at the Hague on the twenty-eighth of March, in quality of her majesty's ambassador extraordinary, and plenipotentiary to their high mightinesses. He confirmed them in their resolutions for having recourse to vigorous measures, and animated the league that was formed to humble France.

Persuaded that the alliance formed by the late king would terminate with the breath of William, Lewis could not refrain his joy when the news of that prince's death reached Versailles. He immediately sent credentials to his minister at the Hague, with instructions for renewing the negotiations with the states, in order, if possible, to detach them from the grand alliance. The French ambassador accordingly presented a memorial, offering them the friendship of his master, and very advantageous terms, if they would agree to a treaty of peace. He added, that he doubted not of their accepting his offer, now they were no longer under the influence of the late king. But, at the same time, gave them to understand, that if, contrary to his expectation, they refused his offers, the forces of his master were ready to enter upon action; and they must now determine, whether they chose quiet and liberty, or war and ruin. "The choice (said he) is in your own power, and I hope you will not sacrifice the happiness and tranquillity of your country to foreign interests."

The answer returned by the states-general was worthy of a people who were determined to preserve their liberty. "We have always (said they) cherished a high esteem for his most Christian majesty's friendship; nor ever done any thing to incur his displeasure; but the alarming preparations for war so near our frontiers, lay us under the necessity of putting ourselves in a posture of defence, and of asking assistance from our allies. You are mistaken, Sir, if you think we had not as much liberty to debate, and take such resolutions as were judged necessary for our preservation, in the life-time of his Britannic majesty, as at present. We cannot, indeed, enough deplore our misfortune, in being deprived of his wise conduct and councils, whose deserts the republic can never forget; and we are resolved to follow the same principles, and continue the same alliances we entered into during his life-time; and make use of such other means as God hath put into our hands for maintaining our liberties and religion."

This spirited answer put an end to the negotiation. The French ambassador returned to Paris, and the states-general applied themselves, with the utmost vigour, for opposing the ambitious designs of the French monarch. The allies were animated by the declarations of the queen; and the earl of Marlborough, after concerting measures for beginning the military operations, returned to England.

When the queen came to the house of peers to give the royal assent to the bills that were ready, among which was that for the better support of her majesty's household, she told the commons, after returning them thanks for having continued to her the same revenue they had settled on her predecessor, that though it would, in all probability, fall short of what it had formerly produced, she would, nevertheless, give directions, that one hundred thousand pounds should be applied this year to the public service. "I am willing (said she) to streighten myself in my own expences, rather than not contribute all I can to the ease and relief of my people."

The parliament were so struck with this generous and unexpected declaration, that both houses presented an address of thanks to her majesty, in which they mentioned her unparalleled grace and goodness in contributing, out of her own revenue, to the ease and relief of her subjects.

It was now warmly debated in council, whether the English should engage as auxiliaries or principals in the war. The Tories, with the earl of Rochester at their head, supported the former; and the Whigs the latter. It was urged by those who thought it most prudent to act as auxiliaries only, that in the last war, the emperor, and some other of the allies, had been very remiss in furnishing their quotas; and bringing their troops early into the field, whereby many advantages had been lost, and the whole burden of the war had been, in a manner, thrown upon the English, who constantly supplied their deficiencies; and, from a delicate notion of honour, anticipated their revenues, and mortgaged their country in the quarrel: whereas it would have been otherwise, had they acted only as auxiliaries; they would have had nothing more to do than to have sent their quota of troops; and the burden of the war must have been borne by those who were most nearly concerned in the quarrel.

This opinion was strongly opposed by the Whigs, who were now joined by the earl of Marlborough. He observed, that the honour of the nation was engaged, on this occasion, to fulfil the late king's engagements; and affirmed, that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unless the English entered as principals in the quarrel. The majority of the council were of the same opinion; and a declaration of war was ordered to be prepared against France and Spain.

On the fourth of May, the declaration was published, lished, with the usual solemnities; in which the queen reproached Lewis with interrupting the freedom of commerce and navigation; with having formed a design of enslaving Europe; with having seized a considerable part of the possessions of Spain; and with having personally insulted her, by acknowledging the son of James II. to be king of England. These charges were all founded on fact, and tended greatly to animate the people against the common disturbers of Europe.

Lord Godolphin was now constituted lord high-treasurer, a post his lordship had, for some time, refused, but was at last prevailed upon to accept it by the earl of Marlborough, who refused to command the forces abroad, unless the treasury was put under the care of Godolphin, on whose punctuality, in point of remittances, he knew he could depend. Marlborough being thus sure of the finances, honoured with the highest confidence of the queen, secured of the favour of the parliament and people, blessed with a capacity equal to his interest, of indefatigable activity and invincible courage, made the necessary preparations for putting himself at the head of the allied army.

Lewis XIV. had now no longer those great ministers, whose talents had so greatly contributed to the glory of his reign. His finances were hurt both by the late wars and the extravagant magnificence of his court. His minister Chamillard, an honest man, but of a narrow capacity, a creature of Madame de Maintenon, had the direction of the military department, a charge much too great for his talents. The resources of government seemed, as it were, in the old age of monarchy, and France found herself in a very critical situation at the very opening of the first campaign.

The emperor and the states-general followed the example of the English, and declared war against France and Spain. The declaration of the former turned principally on the flagrant injury that had been done to the Austrian family by the French king's accepting of the will of Charles II. in favour of his grandson, the duke of Anjou. The states-general observed, "That Lewis had long since cast his eyes upon their provinces; that he had twice attacked them by a most unjust war, in order to open himself a passage to universal monarchy: that he was so far from intending to preserve the peace of Ryswick, that he aimed only at hulling the allies asleep, by prevailing upon them to lay down their arms; and, by ruining the commerce of the Dutch, to render them incapable of making any effectual opposition to his ambitious designs; for that treaty was hardly ratified, before he began evidently to encroach on their trade, the great sinew of their strength, by openly refusing the tariff promised by that treaty."

Lewis was highly incensed at these declarations, especially that of the states, which he affected to treat with the utmost contempt; but did not publish his declaration of war till the beginning of July. He exerted all his power to engage the German princes in his interest, and was so far successful, that the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, the two dukes of Wolfenbuttle, Rodolphus and Anthony, were prevailed upon to declare in his favour.

The elector Palatine opened the campaign with the siege of Keyserwart, a strong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The place was invested in the month of April, but not taken till the seventeenth of July, occasioned by the badness of the weather, and the overflowing of the Rhine.

Marlborough, who had been appointed generalissimo of the allied army, was now at the Hague, regulating the operations of the campaign. Trained up to arms in the military school of the great Turenne, he had more than once received the approbation and thanks of that consummate master in the art of war, for his gallant behaviour. Equally skilled in the intrigues of the cabinet and the field, he possessed the happy art of gaining the hearts of all who were connected with him. Endowed with an exquisite discernment, he always discovered the lucky moment, the very instant it presented itself, and never failed to take the advantage it offered, either in the field or the cabinet. He thoroughly understood the interests of the powers he served, and seldom failed to penetrate the designs of the enemy. Favoured in a particular manner with the confidence of the troops, he was able to avert the impending dangers by his prudence and foresight, or pluck the wreath of conquest from the foe by his courage and presence of mind.

It is no wonder that a general endowed with all these great talents, and who received not from a first minister the plan of his operations, should be able to stop the career of Lewis XIV. and oblige him at last to sue for that peace his arms were unable to command. Marlborough's first campaign gained him universal applause, and confirmed the expectations the allies had formed of his great abilities. He joined the army in the neighbourhood of Nimeguen on the thirtieth of June, passed the Maese on the sixteenth of July, and endeavoured to bring the French army, commanded by the duke of Burgundy and marshal Boufflers, to a general engagement; but this he found impossible. The French chose rather to abandon Spanish Guelderland to the discretion of the allies, than hazard a battle. They retreated under the cannon of Nimeguen; and the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army merely to learn the method of conducting an engagement, learned nothing but how to avoid one. He returned to court; and Lewis was so highly exasperated at the pusillanimous conduct of Boufflers, that he deprived him entirely of his confidence.

The states-general now requested Marlborough to make himself master of the towns in Spanish Guelderland, which would open entirely the navigation of the Maese, and on that account be of the utmost advantage to Holland. The general readily listened to their desire, and took Venlo, Ruremonde, Stevenswart, and Liege. The citadel of the last, which was taken by storm on the twenty-third of October, was extremely rich, the most opulent merchants and others having there deposited their valuable effects, as in a place of safety. No less than three hundred thousand florins in gold and silver were found in it, besides notes for about one million two hundred thousand florins more, drawn upon substantial merchants in Liege, who paid the money. The whole booty was, in short, so considerable, that an English grenadier is said to have received a thousand louis d'ors for his own share. Boufflers continually retreated before the victorious Marlborough, who now repaired to Holland, and was received at the Hague with every mark of the most perfect esteem.

The late king had planned an expedition for reducing Cadiz, and it was now determined to carry it into execution. Sir George Rooke was appointed admiral of the fleet, and the duke of Ormond commander of the land-forces. The fleet, when joined by the Dutch, consisted of fifty ships of the line, thirty English, and twenty Dutch. The transports had fourteen thousand land-forces on board. The fleet sailed on the first of July, and on the twelfth of August anchored in the bay of Bulls, about two leagues distant from Cadiz. The troops were landed on the fifteenth of August, and soon after made themselves masters of Rota and Port St. Mary's. The strictest orders had been issued against plundering before the forces reached either of these places; but it was not in the power of the officers to prevent their hungry and thirsty soldiers from forcing the houses where they expected to find refreshments. Nor was it long before they made their way to the cellars, which they found stored with rich and strong wines. They now became wholly ungovernable, plundered the city, and being joined by the seamen, sent the spoil on board the ships. They stripped the churches and altars altars, of, their plate, and the houses of their treasure and rich furniture, so that the value of the whole was above a million sterling.

So much time was spent at Port St. Mary's, that the garrison of Cadiz had recovered from their consternation; while the late excesses had so highly provoked the Spaniards, that they joined their army from every quarter in great numbers, determined to oppose the invaders of their country. The season of the year was also now so far advanced, that the ships could not, without the utmost danger, continue longer in those seas. The troops were therefore embarked, and the fleet sailed for England.

But though the expedition against Cadiz was unsuccessful, an incident happened which enabled them to perform an action of the utmost service to their country. Captain Hardy having been detached, in the Pembroke, to Lagos, a harbour on the coast of Portugal, to fetch water for the fleet, was informed that M. Chateau Renauld, with a squadron of French men of war, and the Spanish galleons, were put into Vigo, a port of Galicia, in Spain, situated in the bay of Bayonne. It was immediately determined to attempt to destroy this fleet, and they accordingly stood towards Vigo. The passage into the harbour, which was not more than three quarters of a mile broad, was defended on each side with batteries, forts, and breast-works, and a strong boom, consisting of iron chains, top-masts and cables, was stretched across the entrance. Within this boom were seven seventy gun ships, moored with their broadsides to the entrance of the passage.

It was now determined that a detachment of fifteen English and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ships, should be sent in to destroy the enemy's fleet; that the frigates should follow the rear of this detachment; and that the great ships should move forward, in order to support them, if their assistance should be wanted: that the army should be landed, and attack the forts that defended the entrance of the harbour.

The land forces, consisting of two thousand five hundred men, were accordingly landed, and marched directly to the fort which guarded the entrance of the harbour; and though there appeared about eight thousand Spanish foot between the fort and the hills, they had only a few skirmishes with the English, who soon made themselves masters of the fort, the enemy retiring into an old castle or stone tower, from which they fired briskly on the ships. But opening the gate to fall out upon the English, the grenadiers forced their way into the place sword in hand, and forced the garrison, consisting of three hundred and fifty men, to surrender themselves prisoners of war.

The taking of these fortifications greatly facilitated the attempt on the shipping. The admiral made a signal to weigh soon after the land forces were ashore, and the whole squadron stood in towards the boom; but when the van was within cannon-shot of the batteries, it fell calm, so that they were under a necessity of coming to an anchor; but a fresh gale springing up soon after, they cut their cables, and stood directly for the harbour. Vice-admiral Hobson, in the Torbay, who led the van, crowded all the sail he could, and stood directly against the boom, which immediately gave way, and he entered the harbour. The rest of the fleet were not so fortunate. The Dutch admiral and his squadron, who laid their ships broadsides to the boom, in order to add weight to the shock of the Torbay, stuck fast, and they were obliged to cut themselves a passage. The whole squadron now entered the harbour, through a terrible fire from the enemies ships and batteries, which, however, they soon silenced. Admiral Hobson was, however, in the utmost danger. He was boarded by a fire-ship, but had the good fortune to beat her off, though not till after his ship had received so much damage, that he was obliged to shift his flag on board the Monmouth.

The enemy perceiving that it would now be impossible to defend their ships against the superior power and valour of the assailants, resolved to set fire to their own ships, in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. They accordingly burnt eight ships, six galleons, and two advice-boats, but ten French men of war and eleven galleons were taken. The Spaniards had, however, secured a considerable part of their plate, and other rich merchandize, on the appearance of the combined fleet. Near fourteen millions of pieces of eight were lost in six galleons that were burnt, and about half that value brought off by the conquerors. This was a dreadful blow to the enemy, who were thus at once deprived of their ships and treasure.

Admiral Benbow was not so fortunate in the West-Indies. He had, for some time, protected the trade, with great vigilance and success, in that quarter of the world. That brave, but violent man, had incurred the hatred of several of his officers, which, joined with a dastardly spirit, gave the enemy an advantage they could never otherwise have obtained. Benbow's fleet consisted of seven sail of the line, and with this force he scoured the seas of the many privateers that were very injurious to the English trade. Being informed that M. du Caffé, a French admiral, with ten sail of ships, was expected at Hispaniola, Benbow determined, if possible, to intercept him. On the nineteenth of August, he had sight of the enemy, and soon after began the engagement with three ships only; the other four falling astern, came not within gun-shot of the enemy. Had they done their duty, the whole French squadron must have fallen into their hands. Benbow, however, continued the fight, and soon disabled one of the enemy's ships. But du Caffé perceiving that he was not seconded by the rest of his ships, attacked him with the utmost fury, and the admiral had the misfortune to have one of his legs shattered to pieces by a chain-shot. He, however, continued the fight with the same intrepidity; but fearing, from the behaviour of his captains, that they would desert to the enemy, he was obliged to retire to Jamaica. On his arrival, he issued a commission to vice-admiral Whetstone to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. One of them died before the trial; two of them, Kirby and Wade, were convicted, and sentenced to be shot; and the third cashiered and imprisoned. The queen was no sooner informed of their behaviour, than she sent down warrants to all the sea-ports for them to be shot immediately, in order to prevent any applications in their favour. They were sent to England in the Bristol, and as soon as she came to an anchor in Plymouth-Sound, they were both shot, pursuant to their sentence.

When Benbow received the wound, his captain expressed his concern for the misfortune. "I am as sorry as you," (replied Benbow) "but I would lose every limb I have sooner than see the disgrace of my country." He spoke the real sentiments of his heart; and was so deeply affected by this misfortune, that he became melancholy, which, added to the fever occasioned by his wound, put a period to his life, and deprived the queen of one of the best sea-officers England ever produced.

The parliament was to continue only six months after the death of the late King; but her majesty, before the expiration of that term, thought proper to dissolve it, and call a new one, which met for business on the twenty-third of October. The Tories had so prejudiced the people against the behaviour of the whigs, that they had a very considerable majority in this parliament; a circumstance very agreeable to the queen, whose partiality for that party was always remarkable. The commons having chosen Robert Harley, Esq; for their speaker, her majesty came to the house of peers, and opened the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with great satisfaction I meet this parliament, which I have summoned to assist me in carrying on the just and necessary war in which we are engaged, engaged. I have called you together as early as was consistent with your convenience in coming out of your several counties; and I assure myself of such evidences of your affections to me, and your zeal for our common cause, as will not only give spirit and forwardness to our own preparations, but such example and encouragement to our allies, as, by God's blessing, cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy.

"I have met with so many expressions of joy and satisfaction in all the counties through which I have lately had occasion to pass, that I cannot but look upon them as true measures of the duty and affection of the rest of my subjects.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I must desire you to grant me such supplies as will enable me to comply both with our particular treaties and engagements already made, and such others as may be necessary for the encouragement of our allies, and the prosecuting the war where it shall most sensibly affect our enemies, and be most effectual for disappointing the boundless ambition of France.

"And that my subjects may the more cheerfully bear the necessary taxes, I desire you to inspect the accounts of the public receipts and payments; and if there have been any abuses or mismanagements, I hope you will detect them, that the offenders may be punished, and others be deterred, by such like examples, from the like practices. I must observe to you, with some concern, that the funds given by the last parliament have, in some measure, fallen short of the sums proposed to be raised by them; and tho' I have already paid and applied to the public service the hundred thousand pounds I promised to the last parliament, yet it has not supplied that deficiency.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot, without much trouble, take notice to you of the disappointment we had at Cadiz. I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprize, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there. But I have had such a representation of disorders and abuses committed at Port St. Mary's, as has obliged me to give directions for the strictest examination of that matter.

"I am earnestly desirous, for all our sakes, that this may prove a short session. However, I hope you will find time to consider of some better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of so great consequence to the kingdom. On my part, nothing shall be omitted for its encouragement.

"I am firmly persuaded, that the love and good affection of my subjects is the surest pledge of their duty and obedience, and the truest and justest support of the throne. And as I am resolved to defend and maintain the church as by law established, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; so I rely on your care of me. My interests and yours are inseparable; and my endeavours shall never be wanting to make you all safe and happy."

These sentiments, which every sovereign ought to cultivate, had the merit of sincerity; and the addresses of both houses were full of the strongest expressions of duty, esteem, and acknowledgment. The address of the commons was remarkable for their prejudice against the memory of the late king. The purport of the address was, that the astonishing progress of her majesty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had retrieved the ancient honours of the English nation. This expression was very injurious to the memory of William; and therefore occasioned long and very warm debates in the house. The word "retrieved" was particularly objected to, and the word "maintained" offered to be substituted in its room. But the Tories supported the expression, and it passed by a majority of a hundred voices.

The necessary supplies were granted. The duke of Ormond and admiral Rooke received the thanks of both houses for the expedition to Vigo. Marlborough was created a duke, and received the honours he so justly deserved. The queen settled a pension upon him of five thousand pounds a year, and was desirous it should descend to his posterity. This occasioned very warm debates in the house of commons; and the duke intreated the queen to give up a requisition which might be injurious to the public: and the commons, in extolling the services of the general, said, they were only afraid of authorizing, by a precedent, an alienation of the crown revenues, which had been extremely diminished by the excessive grants of the late reign. They secured to the prince of Denmark an annual pension of one hundred thousand pounds, provided he survived her majesty. He was also exempted from that clause in the act of succession, which excluded all foreigners from offices, though they were naturalized; and was created lord high-admiral of England. But the quality of husband to the queen gave him no authority. Anne reigned alone; and he shared in her glory, without acquiring any part of it himself.

The Tories, who had greatly the majority in the house of commons, and were favoured by the queen, carried all before them with the utmost violence. Firmly attached to the church of England, they covered their animosities under the pretence of zeal. Great part of the Whigs, though, to all appearance, united with the church of England, at least so far as not to scruple the ordinary oaths, frequented the assemblies of the non-conformists, without being deprived of any advantage as subjects. The reigning party, instigated by the hatred they bore them, were desirous of excluding them from all employments. They considered as a real schism that occasional conformity, which, under an appearance of submission, concealed a determined revolt from the orthodox faith. In consequence of this opinion, a bill was brought into the lower house, the preamble to which condemned persecution, though it seemed wholly calculated to promote it. Whoever had taken the oaths for holding a place, and afterwards frequented any of the assemblies of the non-conformists, became, according to the tenor of this bill, incapable of holding such employment, was liable to pay a fine of one hundred pounds, and five pounds for every day he held his employment, after having been at any such meeting: nor could he hold any other employment till after one whole year's conformity.

The promoters of this bill pretended, that a national church being requisite, as well for the support of religion as the tranquillity of the state, it was absolutely necessary to maintain it by trusting the civil power in the hands of such only as were faithful to its rules and principles; that it was absurd to give places of consequence to a set of men whose consciences were too tender to obey the laws, yet hardy enough to violate them; that it is contradictory to common sense to be at the same time a conformist and a non-conformist, and to embrace sincerely a communion to which they did not accede; and that this bill added nothing to the rights of the church of England, nor took any thing from the rights of toleration passed in the late reign.

In opposition to these reasons, the opponents of the bill alledged, that the dissenters were in general well affected to the present constitution; that in the last and greatest danger to which the church was exposed, they zealously supported her against all the papists, their common enemies, and have ever since continued to shew every mark of affection and submission to the government, in church and state; that to lay any real hardship upon them, or give rise to jealousies and fears at such a juncture, might be attended with dangerous consequences; that toleration had greatly contributed to the safety and reputation of the church; and plainly proved, that liberty of conscience and gentle measures were the most effectual means for increasing the votaries of the established religion, and diminishing the number of dissenters:

dissenters: that the non-conformists could not properly be termed schismatics; without bringing a heavy charge upon the church of England, which had not only tolerated such schism, but even allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad: that the penalties of this bill were even more severe than those imposed by law upon the papists for assisting at the most solemn act of their religion; and, that toleration and tenderness had always been productive of peace and union, while persecution and violence had never failed to excite discord, and extend superstition.

These arguments were not, however, sufficient to induce the Tories to lay the bill aside: they supported it with all their interest, and the bill passed the lower house by a considerable majority. It was different in the house of peers, where many of the members were in the Whig interest. A very warm debate ensued on the first reading, and several amendments were made to it, namely, that Jacobite meetings should be included; that the one hundred pounds penalty should be reduced to twenty, and that the whole incapacitating clauses should be omitted. They also shortened the terms for information and prosecution, and exempted the dissenters from holding offices for which they could not be qualified without taking the sacrament, provided the act did not extend to university churches, to those of the French and Dutch, or to the governors of hospitals, or the assistants of corporations. These amendments were refused by the commons, and several conferences between the two houses were held on the occasion; but as the lords persisted in adhering to their amendments, and the commons in refusing them, the conferences broke up, and both parties published their proceedings, in vindication of their conduct. The whole interest of the court was exerted on this occasion, but the bill was rejected by one voice only.

A. D. 1703. The convocation had been summoned to meet with the new parliament, but no business of importance was transacted, the disputes between the two houses preventing their taking notice of any thing that required their attention. The whole body of the clergy ranged themselves into two different parties, distinguished by the appellations of "High Church" and "Low Church." The former accused the latter of being Presbyterian hypocrites, and the latter branded the former with being partizans of tyranny and persecution.

These disputes induced the queen to prorogue the parliament. Accordingly her majesty came to the house of peers on the twenty-second of February; and, after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, she put an end to the session by a speech from the throne, in which she thanked them for the dispatch they had given to the public affairs, for the large supplies they had given, and for the provision they had made for the prince. She told them she hoped the dissenters would rest satisfied with the act of toleration, which she was resolved to maintain; that the members of the church would remember she had been educated in their principles, and had been exposed to great difficulties for maintaining them, and therefore they might be assured she would make it her peculiar care to encourage and maintain the church, and transmit it, securely settled, to posterity. She thought some farther laws were necessary for restraining the licentiousness of the press, and hoped they would endeavour to suppress pernicious libels; but above all, she recommended union among themselves; and concluded with acquainting them, that she would apply her share of the prizes taken during the war to the public service.

Scotland was still full of troubles and disputes; and it was feared the contagion would be propagated in England. The queen, desirous of putting an end to all disputes between England and Scotland had made an attempt to unite the two kingdoms, and an act of parliament was passed for that purpose. But though the Scots acknowledged her authority, and swore obedience, they seemed averse to the project.

They gave incessant instances of their inquietude, jealousy, and the animosity of parties, during a long session of their parliament. The ancient genius of the nation shewed its turbulent activity. Bills followed bills without number; the spirit of party had infected all their deliberations. One Fletcher, a furious and intrepid republican, asserted, that Scotland would be enslaved if the submitted to the successor of the crown of England without previously establishing such conditions of government as might serve her as a rampart against the English ministry. The conditions he proposed for the queen's successors were, That all places civil and military; together with all pensions should be conferred by parliament; that the president should be chosen by the assembly; that during the recess of parliament a committee of thirty-six members should have the administration of government under the prince, should act in quality of his council, and be accountable to the parliament of Scotland. He also proposed that the successor should be elected by a majority of voices; and declared he would rather nominate a papist with these conditions, than a good protestant without them. These propositions, however extravagant they may appear, were supported by a strong party in the Scottish parliament, and they were reduced into the form of a bill. Fletcher had many imitators, and many friends. The cry of liberty, and invective against the minister echoed from every part of the house. At last the question was put whether they should take into consideration the supplies, or the state of the nation. One of the members said, that all the fruit of the labours and expences of the nation was only to burden them with fresh supplies, and bend their necks to the yoke of servitude. Another added that their liberties were destroyed, and that the privileges of parliament would soon share the same fate; but that he would defend his own rights at the hazard of his life, and rather die a freeman than live a slave. The duke of Queensberry, the queen's commissioner, opposed the deliberations on Fletcher's bill. This exasperated the party still more, and the earl of Roxborough declared, that if there were no other means of obtaining a right so essential to parliament, it should be sought by the sword. The whole house was now in the highest ferment, and the duke of Queensberry in the utmost danger of being cut to pieces. He however appeased the storm by promising, that in the first session of parliament they should pursue their measures in favour of liberty. He took advantage of this interval of quiet, and prorogued the parliament.

The duke of Ormond had lately been appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the earl of Rochford, who chose to resign his post rather than reside in that kingdom. Ormond was respectable for his merit and generosity, but too much addicted to pleasure, too fond of popular applause, and surrounded by a number of subalterns, whose interested conduct escaped his vigilance. The principal subjects of complaint were malversation and rapine. Great zeal was however shewn for the established government, and an act was passed against the papists, who were suspected to having formed fresh designs in favour of the pretender. The commons also voted the necessary supplies, and granted one hundred and fifty thousand pounds to make good the deficiencies of the necessary branches of the establishment. They also voted a provision for the half-pay officers; abolished pensions amounting to seventeen thousand pounds a year as unnecessary branches of the establishment; and passed an act for settling the succession of the crown, according to a form sent over from England for that purpose.

In the mean time the greatest preparations were making for the ensuing campaign. It had been agreed that the archduke Charles, son to the emperor, should assume the title of king of Spain, demand the infant of Portugal in marriage, and with the assistance of the maritime powers, undertake some enterprise of importance. The emperor had also promised to send so powerful an army into the field as to be able to drive the elector of Bavaria from his dominions; but he was so dilatory in his proceedings, that the French king broke all his measures by sending a powerful re-inforcement to the elector under the command of marshal Villars. The imperialists were defeated near Donavert; the duke of Burgundy made himself master of Old Brifac; Tallard took Landau, and gained a victory over the prince of Hesse. The emperor, who had now declared his son king of Spain under the title of Charles III. trembled for his empire.

The allies were successful only where Marlborough commanded; that able general made himself master of Bon, Huy, and Limbourg. The Dutch general Opdam was defeated by the marshal Boufflers, near Eckeren. Nor were the naval operations this year successful. Hardly any thing was done against the enemy. Sir George Rooke, indeed, in a cruise to the bay of Biscay took a French East India ship, worth an hundred thousand pounds, a man of war of thirty-six guns, and a West-India merchantman worth forty thousand pounds. But having been for some time in an ill state of health, he returned home, and obtained leave to go to Bath.

Lewis flattered himself he should now be able to make such successful efforts against the allies, as to obtain an advantageous peace, and support his grandson on the Spanish throne. But two incidents happened which seemed to wear an inauspicious aspect. The duke of Savoy, father-in-law to the young king of Spain, and to the duke of Burgundy, abandoned the cause which Lewis had undertaken to support, as well as the interest of his two sons-in-law, and joined the allies. The offers made him by the house of Austria, and the promises of money from England, induced him to take this unexpected resolution. The same interested motives prevailed upon the king of Portugal to declare in favour of the archduke and join the grand alliances.

On the ninth of November, the queen opened the session of parliament with the following speech from the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have called you together, as soon as I thought you could conveniently come out of your counties, that no time might be lost in making our preparations for carrying on the present war; in which I do not doubt of your cheerful concurrence, since you must be sensible, that on the success of it depends our own safety and happiness, and that of all Europe.

"I hope I have improved the confidence you imposed upon me last year to your satisfaction, and the advantage of us and our allies, by the treaty with the king of Portugal, and the declaration of the duke of Savoy, which, in a great measure may be imputed to the cheerfulness with which you supported me in this war, and the assurance with which you trusted me in the conduct of it. And we cannot sufficiently acknowledge the goodness of Almighty God, who is pleased to afford us so fair a prospect, as we now have, of bringing it to a glorious and speedy conclusion.

"I must therefore desire you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, to grant me such supplies, as shall be requisite to defray the necessary charge of the war in the next year, with regard not only to our former engagements, but particularly to our alliance lately made with the king of Portugal, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the house of Bourbon, and restoring it to the house of Austria; which treaty being in itself of the highest importance imaginable, and requiring all possible dispatch in the execution of it, has necessarily occasioned a great expence, even in the present year; though not so much as it will require, and for which, I hope, we shall be amply recompensed in the next.

"The subsidies which will now be immediately required for the assistance of the duke of Savoy, will likewise occasion a farther necessary charge.

"I must take notice to you, that no particular provision was made in the last session, either for the charge of our present expedition to Portugal, or for that of the augmentation of troops desired by the states-general; yet the funds given by parliament have held out so well, and the produce of the prizes has proved so considerable, that you will find the public will not be in debt by reason of either of these additional services.

"I may further observe to you, that though the funds for the civil government are diminished by the war, I have, in conjunction with the states-general, contributed, out of my own revenue, towards some public services, and particularly the support of the circle of Suabia, whose firm adherence to the interest of the allies, under the greatest pressures, well deserved our reasonable assistance. And I shall still be careful not to engage myself in any unnecessary expence of my own, that I may have the more to spare towards the ease of my subjects.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I heartily wish some easy and less chargeable method could be found out for the speedy and effectual manning the fleet.

"I must recommend to you to make some regulation for preventing the excessive price of coals. I have examined this matter, and taken particular care to appoint convoys for that service; but the price has not been in the least abated, notwithstanding a considerable quantity has been imported since that time. This gives great ground of suspicion there may be a combination of some persons to enrich themselves at the general oppression of others, and particularly the poor. It will deserve your consideration, how to remedy this great inconvenience.

"And in all our affairs, I must recommend as much dispatch as the nature of them will admit. This is necessary to make our preparations early; on which, in a great measure, depends the good success of all our enterprizes. I want words to express to you my earnest desire of seeing all my subjects in perfect peace and union among themselves. I have nothing so much at heart as their general welfare and happiness. Let me therefore desire you all, that you would carefully avoid any heats or divisions, that may disappoint me of that satisfaction, and give encouragement to the common enemies of our church and state."

The admonition at the close of this speech was generally thought to regard the occasional conformity bill. The commons, however, determined not to lose sight of their favourite scheme; and the bill was revived early in the session, but with some mitigation in the penalties. It passed the commons by a considerable majority, but was rejected by twelve voices by the lords.

While the parliament was engaged in deliberating on this bill, the most dreadful tempest happened that had been known in the memory of man. The violence of the storm was confined to the southern parts of England, where the damage was very great. It began on the twenty-seventh of November, and the wind was so violent that several houses in London were blown down, and the whole city so dreadfully shaken, that the inhabitants expected to be buried under the ruins of the buildings. The greater part of our navy was then at sea, a circumstance that filled the nation with terror. And had not the fury of the storm happened at high-water the loss might have proved fatal to the nation. Fourteen or fifteen men of war was lost, and near fifteen hundred seamen perished. Several merchant ships were also cast away.

The commons immediately presented an address to her majesty, expressing their sense of this national calamity, and that they would not suffer any diminution in the royal navy, and would therefore make immediate provision for repairing the loss occasioned by the late storm, and besought her majesty to give orders for building such capital ships as she should think think proper, assuring her that the house would effectually make good the expence.

When the treaty with Portugal was concluded, it was determined to send the archduke into that kingdom, in order to attempt to dethrone the duke of Anjou, and seize the crown, which he claimed as his right. A fleet was accordingly fitted out to convey him to Lisbon, under the command of Sir George Rooke. The prince landed in England about the middle of December, and soon after embarked with a considerable number of English and Dutch troops. At his arrival at Lisbon he was received with all the external marks of satisfaction.

A. D. 1704. Notwithstanding the loss of the occasional conformity bill had occasioned great dissensions between the two houses, they were unanimous in granting the necessary supplies to her majesty for carrying on the war with vigour, and enabling her to fulfil all the conditions of the treaties she had signed with foreign powers. They were so desirous of defeating the ambitious designs of France, that they resolved to maintain ninety thousand men by sea and land.

The heats between the lords and commons were hardly subsided, when an account of a plot in favour of the pretender, raised once more the flame higher than ever. Several persons concerned in this scheme being apprehended, the peers took upon them the business of trying the prisoners. This gave the commons offence; and embraced the opportunity of giving vent to that animosity, they had for a short time concealed. They represented to the queen their astonishment that the peers should violate the laws and wound the prerogative, by taking upon them the trial of the prisoners arrested by order of her majesty. They assured her of their readiness to support her prerogative, and oppose every attempt that might be made against her person. This address irritated the upper house. They declared it injurious, contrary to the rules of parliament, and pregnant with consequences destructive of the liberties and constitution of the kingdom. They farther declared, that they had an incontestible right to try state criminals whether prisoners or not; and supported this claim by a number of precedents. But all bodies of men are jealous of their privileges; and the commons, who had formerly, on the same account, contended with their princes, now made them matter of contest with the nobility. The lords, on their part did not fail to mortify the commons.

While these disputes continued between the two houses, her majesty sent a message to the commons, in which she told them, That having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, she had remitted the arrears of the tenths to the said poor clergy; that she would grant her whole revenue arising from the first-fruits and tenths, as far as it should become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the house of commons could find any methods by which her good intentions to the poor clergy could be rendered more effectual; it would be a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to her majesty.

Upon receiving this message the commons addressed the queen, expressing their thanks for her gracious message, and her pious concern for increasing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue; and assured her majesty they would do their utmost to make her majesty's charitable intentions more effectual. Accordingly a bill was brought in "for making more effectual her majesty's gracious intentions for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy, by enabling her majesty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the first-fruits and tenths." They also repealed the statute of mortmain so far, as to give free liberty to all men, either by deed or their last wills, to give what they thought proper towards the augmentation of benefices. This part of the bill was strongly opposed in the house of lords, where it was alledged it would be opening a door for the clergy to practise on the weakness of dying men. This argument was not, however, strong enough to gain over the majority: the bill passed both houses, and afterwards received the royal assent.

The queen exerted herself to bring about a reconciliation between the two houses, but in vain. Their animosities did not indeed hinder the more essential business of the nation; but as it was feared they might be productive of very fatal consequences, the queen determined to put an end to the session of parliament, which was accordingly done on the third of April, when her majesty, after thanking them for the large supplies they had granted, and the dispatch they had given to the public business, she added, "At the opening of this session, I earnestly expressed my desires of seeing you in perfect union among yourselves, as the most effectual means imaginable to disappoint the ambition of our enemies, and reduce them to an honourable and lasting peace. And though this has not met with the success I wished and expected, yet being fully convinced that nothing is so necessary to our common welfare, I am not discouraged from persisting in the same earnest desires, that you would go down into your several counties so disposed to moderation and unity as becomes all those who are joined in the same religion and interest.

"This I am persuaded will make you sensible, that nothing, next to the blessing God, can so much contribute to our success abroad and our safety at home."

The affairs of Scotland gave her majesty equal uneasiness. In order to settle the ferments in that kingdom, where the thirst of independence was grown outrageous, she consented to an act of surety, which had passed the Scottish parliament. The purport of this act was, that in case the queen died without issue, the parliament should immediately assemble and nominate a successor to the crown, distinctly from the crown of England, unless a national establishment, conformable to the laws of the country, and independent of the English councils previously took place, and the court had not given the people a power to arm in their defence. Lord Godolphin, then prime-minister, advised her majesty to yield, on this occasion, to the necessity of circumstances; though by this proceeding he exposed himself greatly to the censure of the Tories.

The affairs of the emperor were now in a deplorable situation. Pressed on one side by the Hungarians who had shaken off the yoke, and under prince Ragotski, were fighting for their liberty; and on the other by the elector of Bavaria, who held every thing upon the Danube, and threatened Vienna itself with a siege; he had no other resource than that of imploring the assistance of her Britannic Majesty. The duke of Marlborough strongly pressed the necessity of sending immediate assistance to the emperor, and the queen accordingly returned a favourable answer to the memorial of that distressed prince. Marlborough arrived at the Hague about the beginning of May, and represented, in the strongest terms, to the states-general the danger to which the empire, and even all Europe were threatened, if an immediate check was not given to the French and Bavarians in Germany. The states, persuaded that it would be bad policy to oppose the duke, though they were very desirous of keeping the army in Flanders, gave their consent; and Marlborough prepared for carrying into execution the plan he had formed, that of marching into the heart of Germany, and delivering the house of Austria from impending ruin.

He marched with such expedition that he reached Mildenheim on the tenth of June; where he was visited by prince Eugene, and the next day by prince Lewis of Baden. A long consultation was held by the generals, in which it was agreed that prince Eugene should command a separate army on the Rhine, and that the duke and prince Lewis should command alternately.

alternately. The march was prosecuted with the utmost expedition, till they reached the banks of the Danube, near Donawert, opposite to the Bavarian lines, where about eight thousand French and as many Bavarians lay intrenched to guard the country they had conquered. Alarmed at the approach of the allies, the duke of Bavaria sent a detachment of his best troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was posted at Schellenberg, a rising ground on the Danube, near Donawert. As that post was of very great importance, d'Arco had, for some time, employed his troops in throwing up entrenchments. Marlborough knowing his works were not completed, resolved, if possible, to drive the enemy from their post. Accordingly, on the sixth of July, at three in the morning, he advanced at the head of a detachment of six hundred foot, thirty squadrons of English and Dutch, and three battalions of imperial grenadiers, the rest of the army following with the greatest diligence. But the distance, badness of the road, and other incidents, so greatly retarded his march, that it was three in the afternoon before the artillery passed the river Wermitz, which runs by Donawert.

The attack was now begun, with the utmost intrepidity, by the English and Dutch, before the Imperialists could come up. The enemy made a gallant resistance; but prince Lewis leading up the Imperialists, the entrenchments were forced; a terrible slaughter ensued; and the greater part of the enemy pushed into the Danube, where numbers of them perished. The victory was complete; and the troops that had the good fortune to reach the opposite side of the Danube, fled in the utmost confusion. Sixteen pieces of cannon and thirteen standards were taken. Donawert immediately surrendered; and the elector of Bavaria, informed of the defeat of his troops, repassed the Danube, marched with the utmost precipitation, and encamped under the cannon of Augsburg. He was offered very advantageous terms, provided he would abandon the French interest, and join the grand alliance. At first the elector seemed to listen to the proposal; but being informed that marshal Tallard had passed the Black Forest, and was advancing, by forced marches, to his assistance, he broke off the negotiation, declaring, that since the French monarch made such powerful efforts to support him, he thought himself obliged in honour to remain firm to his alliance. This conduct of the elector was highly resented by the confederate generals, who detached thirty squadrons of horse and dragoons to lay waste the country of Bavaria, to the very walls of its capital.

Eugene exerted all his vigilance to prevent marshal Tallard from joining the duke of Bavaria, but could not succeed. The junction was made at Bibarach, near Ulm, about the end of July. Marlborough immediately left his camp, and joined prince Eugene at Munster; while prince Lewis of Baden formed the siege of Ingoldstadt. On the twelfth of August, Marlborough and Eugene reconnoitred the camp of the enemy, whom they found advantageously posted on a hill near Hochstet, their right being covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim; their left by the village of Lutzingen; and their front by a rivulet, the banks of which were steep, and the bottom very marshy.

This advantageous situation did not, however, intimidate these two great generals: they resolved to attack the enemy before they had time to fortify their camp; advice having been received that Villeroy was on his march for Wirtemberg, in order to destroy that country, and cut off the communication of the allies from the Rhine, which must have been attended with very fatal consequences, could it have been effected. Orders were therefore issued that very night for all the baggage of the army to be sent towards Donawert, and the troops ready to march by break of day. About seven in the morning of the thirteenth of August, the allies appeared in sight of the enemy's camp, where every thing was in a profound silence; not imagining the allies would dare to attack them in so advantageous a post. They were therefore thrown into the utmost confusion at the appearance of our troops: they discharged two pieces of cannon to call in their foraging parties, and set fire to several small villages that were between them and the allied army. About nine in the morning, the cannonading on both sides began, and continued, without intermission, till one in the afternoon.

The French and Bavarian armies consisted of near sixty thousand men. The right wing was commanded by marshal Tallard, and the left by the elector of Bavaria, assisted by Marfin. The confederate army did not exceed fifty thousand men. Prince Eugene commanded on the right; the lords Cutts and Orkney, the generals Churchill, Lumley, and Ingoldsbey, the left; while Marlborough took his post in the center, as commander of the whole.

Such was the situation of the two armies when the battle began about one in the afternoon. There was a necessity for crossing the rivulet already mentioned before the allies could attack the enemy, who had taken care to guard it with three squadrons of horse, under the command of M. de Zurlauben, a Bavarian general, who fell so vigorously on the allies, that they were obliged thrice to give ground; but this handful of men not being properly supported, they were soon overpowered by numbers, and driven from their post. Had the French generals properly supported these brave troops, the allies would not have found the passage of the rivulet an easy task; but by neglecting this, they committed an error they could never retrieve. Their artillery played very hotly, but did very little execution; and the passage of the rivulet was effected in the face of the enemy. As soon as the center and part of the right had passed the rivulet in different places, they formed on the other side, without any interruption from the enemy, who remained quiet on the hills. Marlborough immediately led his troops to the attack of Tallard's cavalry. The French stood the shock, with great firmness, for some time; but were at last broken, and forced to give way. Tallard flew immediately to the village of Blenheim, where he had posted twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons. These troops formed a distinct army, and kept up a continued fire on Marlborough's division while he attacked the right wing. Tallard having given his orders in the village, hastened back to the place of action, where the duke, with a body of horse and some battalions of foot between the squadrons, was driving the French cavalry before him, and which Tallard could not prevent.

In the mean time, the cavalry of the confederates left wing being now completely formed, ascended the hill of Lutzingen with astonishing intrepidity, and charged the enemy's horse with such fury, that tho' they rallied several times, they were obliged at last to betake themselves to flight. The victorious Marlborough now forced his way between the two bodies of the French army on one side, while the rest of the generals got between the village of Blenheim, and Tallard's division on the other. In this desperate situation, Tallard flew to rally some of his broken squadrons; but the badness of his sight completed his misfortune. He mistook a squadron of Hessians for his own forces, and was taken prisoner, together with many officers of distinction.

Prince Eugene had attempted the passage of the rivulet at a place where the banks of the stream were very steep, and the bottom rough and uneven. The least opposition on the part of the enemy must therefore have rendered his efforts fruitless, and have obliged him to retire and seek a more favourable spot for the execution of his purpose; but the enemy made none. He had no sooner reached the opposite bank, than he attacked the left wing, commanded by marshal Marfin, with the utmost vigour. But the imperial horse behaved very ill on this occasion; they they were so intimidated by the constant fire of the enemy, that they could not be brought to advance within musket-shot. The Danish and Prussian troops also gave back in the same manner, but being at length animated by the gallant example of their officers, they flew to the charge, and exerted themselves with so much vigour, that they put the enemy to flight; and Marlborough finding it in vain to make any farther resistance, abandoned Oberklau and Lutzingen, and was pursued as far as the villages of Morfelingen and Teissenhoven, whence he retired to Dillingen and Lavingen. The route now became general through the whole French and Bavarian armies: every one fled with the greatest precipitation; numbers ran headlong into the Danube, and perished.

A small part of the infantry was saved by the count du Bourg, who retreated over the marshes of Hochstet. But the little army cooped up in Blenheim was forgot. It consisted of twenty-seven battalions and twelve squadrons, amounting in the whole to about eleven thousand effective men, and the best troops in France. They were waiting in Blenheim for orders, and knew nothing of the rout of their army till they were surrounded by the allies. It was impossible for them to make any effectual resistance: the streets were too narrow for them to form; and their own artillery, now in the hands of the allies, would soon have decided the contest. They therefore thought proper to lay down their arms, and surrender themselves prisoners of war.

Such was the conclusion of this celebrated action, known in France by the name of the battle of Hochstet, and in England and Germany by that of the battle of Blenheim. The triumph of the allies was complete. Twelve thousand men were killed, and fourteen thousand taken prisoners. The trophies consisted of one hundred pieces of cannon, three hundred pair of colours, and an immense booty. The loss of the victors amounted to about five thousand killed, and eight thousand wounded.

The duke of Bavaria was obliged to fly, and abandon his country to the conquerors, who penetrated into Alsace, took Landau, and scattered terror in every region through which they passed. Marlborough signalized himself in the action, no less by his courage than by his military talents. His prisoner, Tallard, complimenting him on having conquered the best troops in the world, he answered, that his own were certainly better, because they had conquered them. Marlborough received a recompence worthy of his services. The emperor created him a prince of the empire; the states received him with the same respect as if he had been the stadtholder; and his country received him with every demonstration of joy.

The campaign in Portugal was, far from being successful. To fight in conjunction with heretics, was considered by the Portuguese as a kind of apostacy. It was therefore in vain to hope for success; and accordingly, instead of making conquests in Spain, several of the towns of Portugal were taken by the enemy. The duke of Schomberg, who commanded the allied army, was so enraged at the behaviour of the Portuguese, that he desired leave to resign his commission. His request was granted, and the earl of Galway sent over to succeed him, with eight thousand Dutch troops, who reached Lisbon the beginning of August.

The operations at sea were this year very considerable. Sir George Rooke, after landing Charles at Lisbon, cruised for some time on the coast of Portugal; but being requested to assist in executing a design on Barcelona, projected by the prince of Hesse d'Armstadt, he readily gave his consent, took on board that prince with a detachment of land-forces; but the attempt proving fruitless, he crossed the Mediterranean, and came to an anchor in the road of Tetuan. A council of war was now held on board the admiral's ship, where it was determined to make an attempt on Gibraltar, which was known to be slightly garrisoned.

The next day the whole fleet got under sail, and on the twenty-first of July came to an anchor in Gibraltar bay. The land forces, amounting to eighteen hundred, with the prince of Hesse at their head, were landed, about four in the afternoon, on the neck of land to the northward of the town, in order to cut off all communication with the country. A summons was now sent to the governor to surrender the town; but he answered he would defend it to the last extremity. The next morning the cannonade from the ships began with the utmost fury; and it was soon perceived that the Spaniards were driven from the works at the south mole head, on which all the boats of the fleet were manned and armed, and took possession of the fortifications. The Spaniards immediately sprung a mine, which destroyed all the fortifications on the mole, killed two lieutenants and forty men, and wounded about sixty. The seamen, however, kept their post; and having made themselves masters of a redoubt between the mole and the town, they turned the cannon against the enemy. A peremptory summons was now sent to the governor, who, on the twenty-fourth in the morning, capitulated, and the prince of Hesse took possession of the place.

The town of Gibraltar being thus reduced, the admiral sailed again into the Mediterranean, in order, if possible, to meet with the French fleet, that had, for some time, been lying at Toulon. He discovered them on the eleventh of August; and on the thirteenth they were not above three leagues distant; and a little to the westward of Malaga. They now drew up in a line of battle, and lay ready to receive him. Their fleet consisted of fifty-two ships and twenty-four galleys, and the English of fifty-three ships. Sir George Rooke, assisted by the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes, commanded in the center; Sir Cloudesly Shovel and Sir John Leake led the van; and the Dutch formed the rear.

The battle began about four in the morning, when the van and rear pressed forward to a close engagement; and soon obliged that part of the French line to give way; but the French center stood firm, and the fight was maintained with the greatest obstinacy till night obliged them to desist. The French took advantage of the night to bear away to leeward; and the wind shifting before the day appeared, they were seen three leagues at least to windward. Both spent the day in repairing the damages they had sustained; and in the night the French stood away farther to the northward; nor could the English bring them again to an engagement, though they followed them for two days for that purpose. Though this victory was far from being decisive, yet the French ships received so much damage, that they were never after able to engage the English during the whole war. A ruinous war had exhausted the resources of France, and a series of disasters threatened her with ruin. The two rear-admirals, Byng and Dilkes, and captain Jennings, commander of the St. George, received the honour of knighthood.

The parliament was opened on the twenty-fourth of October by a speech from the throne, wherein her majesty observed, that the great and remarkable success with which God had blessed her arms, infused an unanimous joy through the whole kingdom; and that a timely improvement of the present advantages would enable her to procure a lasting foundation of security for England, as well as a firm support for the liberties of Europe. She declared, that her intention was to be kind and indulgent to all her subjects. She expressed her hope that they would do nothing to endanger the loss of this opportunity; and that there would be no contention among them, but who should do most for the public welfare. "Such a temper as this (added she) in all your proceedings, cannot fail of securing your reputation both at home and abroad. This would make me a happy queen, whose endeavours shall never be wanting to make you a happy and flourishing people."

Nothing so much encourages a passion for arms as success. The queen found her parliament no less ready to grant her supplies than to compliment her on the victories she had obtained over the arms of the common disturber of Europe. Almost five millions were voted for the service of the ensuing year.

The measures of the Scottish parliament, the act of surety, and the seeds of rebellion scattered through the kingdom, inspired at once apprehensions and resentments. The matter was first opened in the house of peers by lord Haversham, who observed, "that the settlement of the succession of Scotland had been postponed, partly because the ministry of that kingdom were weak and divided, and partly from a received opinion that the succession was never seriously and cordially intended by those who managed the affairs of Scotland in the cabinet-council:" he expatiated on the bad consequences that might attend the act of security, which he stiled a Bill of Exclusion; "for," said he, "can any reasonable man believe, that those who promoted that bill, could ever be real friends to the succession as settled by the English parliament?" He particularly mentioned that clause by which the heritors and burghs were ordered to exercise their fencible men every month: he said, "that the nobility and gentry in Scotland were as learned and brave as any in Europe, and that these were generally discontented; that the common people were very numerous, very robust, and very poor; and asked, who was the man that could tell what such a multitude, so armed and so disciplined, might do under such leaders, should they find opportunities suitable to their intention? Besides, added he, I look upon it as of the last importance to England, that there should not be the least shadow or pretence for a necessity to keep up a regular standing army in this kingdom in time of peace." These particulars he earnestly recommended to the consideration of the house, and concluded his speech with the following words of lord Bacon, "Let men beware how they neglect or suffer matter of trouble to be prepared, for no man can forbid the sparks that may set all on fire."

A warm debate ensued in the house of peers, but the majority agreeing with lord Haversham, they came to the following resolutions, "That to prevent the inconveniences that might happen by the late act passed in Scotland, the queen might be enabled, on the part of England, to name commissioners to treat about an entire union with Scotland, provided those powers be not put in execution till commissioners should be named on the part of Scotland, by the parliament of that kingdom: that no Scotsman should enjoy the privileges of an Englishman, except such as were settled in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the plantations, or such as might be in the sea or land service, until an union could be effected, or the succession settled as in England: that the traffic of cattle from Scotland to England should be stopped: that orders should be issued for seizing such vessels as should be found trading from Scotland to France, or to the parts of any of her majesty's enemies: that cruisers should be appointed for that purpose: and that the exportation of English wool into Scotland should be prohibited." On these resolutions a bill for an union with Scotland was brought into the house, and being passed by the lords, it was sent down to the commons, received the sanction of that house, and afterwards the royal assent.

The duke of Marlborough being returned to England received the thanks of both houses, for his great services to the nation; and the commons presented an address to the queen, intreating her to consider of some proper means to perpetuate the memory of such noble actions, particularly the battle of Blenheim. In answer to this address the queen informed the house that she was willing to part with her manor of Woodstock and hundred of Wootton to the duke of Marlborough and his heirs. A bill was immediately brought in for enabling her majesty to bestow these manors on the duke and his heirs. The comtroller of the board of works was also ordered by her majesty to build a magnificent palace for the duke in Woodstock, and to be distinguished by the name of Blenheim-house.

But Sir George Rooke who had spent his life in the service, and who had done great honour to his country, was not only neglected, but dismissed from his command, and suffered to retire to his seat in Kent; and the command of the fleet bestowed on Sir Cloudesley Shovel. So capricious and uncertain are the favours of the great.

A. D. 1705. The good understanding that had subsisted between the two houses was now disturbed on a question relating to the rights of electing members of parliament. And particularly, whether an elector's vote being refused by the officer appointed to take the poll, he might not bring an action at law against the offender? Several conferences were held between the two houses in order to an amicable decision of the question; but neither being willing to recede in the least from the principles they had adopted, and the disputes seeming to threaten very serious consequences, the queen determined to put an end to the session. Accordingly she came to the house of peers on the fourteenth of March, and after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, and making a short speech from the throne, the prorogued the parliament. On the fifth of April it was dissolved by proclamation, and writs were issued for calling a new one pursuant to the act for triennial parliaments.

The Scottish parliament met on the twenty-eighth of June; but many of the members being absent, the lord-commissioner adjourned the house till the third of July, when the queen's letter was read to the assembly. She observed, "That at their last meeting she recommended to them, with the greatest earnestness, the settling of the succession of that kingdom in the protestant line; and several particulars having since happened which shewed the great inconvenience of that matter continuing in suspense; she could not but at present most seriously renew the recommendation of that settlement, as being convinced of the growing necessity of it, both for the preservation of the protestant religion, the peace and safety of all her dominions, and for defeating the designs and attempts of all her enemies. And to prevent any objection to the said settlement, that could be suggested from the views or fears of future inconveniences that might happen to that kingdom from thence, she should be ready to give the royal assent to such provisions and restrictions as should be found necessary and reasonable in a case of such importance; and therefore she must recommend it to them, as the most necessary for all the ends already mentioned; that they should proceed to the settlement of the succession before all other business."

She said, "she was fully satisfied, and doubted not but they were, that great benefits would arise to all her subjects, by an union of Scotland and England, and that nothing would contribute more to the composing of differences, and extinguishing heats that were unhappily raised and fomented by the enemies of both nations, than the promoting of every thing that had a tendency to procure so valuable an end; she therefore heartily recommended to them to pass an act for a commission to set a treaty on foot between the kingdoms, as the parliament of England had done, for effectuating what was so desirable, and for such other matters and things as might be judged proper for her honour, and the good and advantage of both kingdoms for ever, in which she should most heartily give her best assistance."

The duke of Argyle, high-commissioner for Scotland, strongly recommended the measures mentioned in the queen's letter to the consideration of the house, and was seconded by the lord-chancellor. The affair of the succession was accordingly taken into consideration, when duke Hamilton proposed that the treaty with England should be first discussed, and the the limitations settled before they proceeded any farther in the act of succession. This was agreed to; and that nobleman made a motion for leaving the nomination of the commissioners to the queen. This occasioned a very violent debate; but the question being at last put, Whether the nomination should be left to the queen or the parliament? the duke's motion was approved of by a small majority. A bill was therefore brought in and passed by the house for treating about an union with England; but it was declared that the treaty should not commence till the clause in the English act of parliament, declaring the subjects of Scotland "Aliens," be rescinded.

The campaign was not filled with remarkable actions. The imperial army was so slow in its motion, that the plan laid by Marlborough for pushing his conquests on the Moselle, was rendered abortive. The French, animated by the absence of that famous general, did not fail of making use of their superiority in the Low Countries; they made themselves masters of Huy, and undertook the siege of Liege. But Marlborough marched back with so much expedition that he saved the latter, the enemy retiring at his approach with great precipitation. The duke soon retook Huy, and obliged the enemy to retire behind their lines. Marlborough determined to force them, though the French and Bavarians consisted of near one hundred battalions and one hundred and forty-six squadrons. The force of the allied army was nearly equal, consisting of ninety-five battalions and one hundred and fifty-nine squadrons.

To facilitate this difficult undertaking it was determined to make a false attack, in order to divide the attention of the enemy. Accordingly the army, under the command of M. d'Averquerque decamped early in the morning of the seventeenth of July, and marched towards Burdin on the other side of the Mehaigne. Marlborough made a motion at the same time, as if he intended to support Averquerque in his attack of the lines in the neighbourhood of Messelin, where they were weakest. This feint produced the desired success; the French detached large bodies of forces to these parts; leaving the others, where the duke really intended to make his attack, in a very weak condition. As soon as the night came on, the duke put his army in motion, while d'Averquerque repassed the Mehaigne to join, and both marched in conjunction to support a detachment ordered to make an attempt on the enemy's lines near Heylisham. This was the strongest part of the whole, and consequently where the enemy least expected an attack. They were therefore seized with astonishment when the allies appeared, and incapable of making any effectual opposition, the greater part of their forces having been drawn off to guard the other parts.

But the confederate troops had no sooner passed the lines than they were attacked by twenty-four squadrons of Bavarian horse and twenty battalions; the dispute was for some time very sharp; but the horse and dragoons of the right wing coming up, the enemy were put to flight, and all their standards, colours, and cannon, were taken. The French retired under the cannon of Louvain; and the deputies of the states-general having refused to concur with a proposal made by the duke of Marlborough for passing the river Ysch and attacking the French in their camp; he accepted of an invitation from the new emperor Joseph, and sat out for Vienna; the troops having retired into winter quarters.

Lord Galway had very little success this campaign. The Portuguese never acted with vigour. They took the towns of Valencia d'Alcantara, and Albuquerque. After which they invested Bajadox, and would have carried the place had they not been prevented by an unforeseen accident. Lord Galway being one day examining the trenches, a cannon-ball swept away his right arm, and he was obliged to be carried off the field. The siege was now pushed with less vigour than before, and the marquis de Thesse found means to throw a thousand men into the place. All hopes of reducing Bajadox were now over; the allied army therefore abandoned the enterprise, and marched into winter quarters.

The success in Catalonia, however, made up for this disappointment. Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and the earl of Peterborough, reduced Barcelona, and the whole province of Catalonia submitted to Charles. A very remarkable incident happened at the siege of Barcelona; which does the highest honour to the earl of Peterborough. While the viceroy was capitulating with the English general at one of the gates of the city, a party of German soldiers penetrated into the place, and began to pillage the houses and massacre the inhabitants. The viceroy complained of this treachery. Peterborough assured him he might depend on his honour, and desired permission to enter with his troops, promising to appease the tumult, and return to finish the articles of capitulation. He was trusted, and marched into the city, followed by the English; where he soon put a stop to the disorders, dispersed the German soldiers, took from them their plunder, and returned to sign the articles of the treaty.

The first session of the new parliament was opened by her majesty on the twenty-seventh of October, with a speech from the throne; wherein she represented the necessity of acting vigorously against France, as the common enemy to the liberties of Europe. She recommended the fortitude of the duke of Savoy, which, she said, was without example, and merited all their endeavours to encourage him to persevere in the same conduct. She informed them of her intention of issuing commissions for treating of an union with Scotland. She earnestly recommended unanimity and brotherly affection among her people; and observed, that some persons had endeavoured to foment animosities, and even to suggest in print, that the established church was in danger. "Such (added she) are enemies to me and my kingdom, and mean only to cover designs which they dare not publicly avow, by endeavouring to distract the nation with unmeasurable and groundless distrusts and jealousies." She declared she would always affectionately support and countenance the church of England, as by law established; that she would inviolably maintain the toleration; that she would endeavour to promote religion and virtue, encourage trade, and every thing else that had a tendency to make them a happy and a flourishing people. "And they (added she) who shall concur zealously with me in carrying on these good designs, shall be sure of my kindness and favour."

Addresses of thanks were voted by both houses, who promised to assist her majesty to the utmost of their power. They also voted their thanks to the duke of Marlborough for his eminent services to the queen and nation; and established the funds necessary for carrying on the war with vigour during the approaching campaign.

The next business that engaged their attention, was the union with Scotland; and the parliament of that kingdom having declared, that they would enter into no treaty with England till the act in which they were declared aliens should be rescinded, the two houses immediately repealed that act, and also took off the several prohibitions and restrictions which had been laid upon the trade between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1706. Soon after the prorogation of the parliament, which happened on the nineteenth of March, her majesty appointed commissioners for treating of an union between England and Scotland, a treaty she was very desirous of concluding. Every thing being ready for entering on this important work, the commissioners of both kingdoms met on the sixteenth of April, at the council-chamber in the cockpit, in order to negotiate an agreement that was for ever to put an end to the disputes that had for so many ages subsisted between these two sovereignties.

It was at first proposed by the Scottish commissioners to conclude a federal union like that subsisting between the cantons of Switzerland; but nothing less than an incorporating union would satisfy the English, who were determined to take away effectually from the Scottish parliament the power of repealing the articles of this treaty. Pursuant to this resolution, the lord-keeper of England proposed, "That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland should be united into one nation, by the name of Great-Britain; that it should be represented by one parliament; and that the succession of the monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majesty's body, should be subject to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England, in the thirteenth year of the reign of king William III. intitled, An act for the farther limitation of the crown, &c."

The commissioners of Scotland finding a federal union would not be accepted, agreed to the preliminaries proposed by the lord-keeper, with this proviso only, "That all the subjects of the united kingdom of Great-Britain should have full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation to and from any part or place within the said united kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging; and that there should be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the subjects of either kingdom." No objection was made to this proviso, except a reserving such particulars as, in the course of the negotiation, should appear to be advantageous to the subjects of both countries. These preliminaries being settled, the queen made them a visit, in order to quicken their deliberations, and finish a treaty she had so greatly at heart. They accordingly exerted themselves, in order to satisfy the request of her majesty; and at last finished the negotiation for uniting the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The following is the substance of the articles that composed the treaty of union.

ARTICLES OF UNION BETWEEN ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND.

I. That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland shall, from the first of May, 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain; and that the ensigns armorial of the same united kingdoms be such as her majesty shall appoint, and the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in such a manner as her majesty shall think fit; and used in all flags, banners, standards, and ensigns, both by sea and land.

II. That the succession of the united monarchy of Great-Britain shall be to the princess Sophia, and her heirs; and that all papists, or persons who marry papists, shall be for ever excluded from inheriting the crown of Great-Britain, agreeable to the provision for the descent of the crown of England made in the first year of the reign of their late majesties, king William and queen Mary, intitled, An act declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, &c.

III. That the united kingdoms of Great Britain shall be represented by one and the same parliament, to be stiled the parliament of Great-Britain.

IV. That the subjects of the united kingdoms shall have freedom of trade and navigation within the same, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges and advantages; except where it is otherwise expressed in these articles.

V. That all ships or vessels belonging to the Scots [at the time of ratifying the treaty of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland] shall be deemed British built; the owners making oath that [at the time of ratifying the treaty of union in the parliament of Scotland] the same did, in the whole or in part, belong to them.

VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the same regulations of trade, and liable to the same customs and duties, except and reserving the duties upon export and import of such particular commodities, from which any person, the subject of either kingdom, are especially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the union, are to remain safe and entire to them, in all respects as before the same; and that from and after the union, no Scots cattle carried into England shall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private account, than those duties to which the cattle of England are or shall be liable within the said kingdom: and seeing, by the laws of England, there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats, ground or unground, are not expressed, that from and after the union, when oats shall be sold for fifteen shillings sterling per quarter, or under, there shall be paid two shillings and sixpence sterling for every quarter of the oat-meal exported in the term of the law, whereby and so long as rewards are granted for the exportation of grains. And that the beer of Scotland have the same reward as barley. And because the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a discouragement to tillage, therefore the prohibition now enforced by the law of Scotland against importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond sea, into Scotland, do, after the union, remain in the same force as at present, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great-Britain, for the discouragement of the importation of the said victual from beyond sea.

VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the same excise upon the same exciseable liquors, except only that the thirty-four English barrel of beer or ale, amounting to twelve gallons Scots present measure, sold in Scotland by the brewer at nine shillings and sixpence sterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at two-pence the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not, after the union, liable, on account of the present excise on exciseable liquors in England, to any higher imposition than two shillings sterling upon the aforesaid thirty-four gallons English barrel, being twelve gallons the present Scots measure.

VIII. Foreign salt in England shall pay the same duty as in Scotland; [but because the duties of foreign salt imported, may be very heavy on the merchant importer, that therefore all foreign salt imported into Scotland shall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties upon salt: and that the merchant may have whatever quantity thereof his occasions may require, not under a weight of forty bushels at a time, upon his giving security for the duty of what quantities he receives, payable in six months.] By this article it was also provided, that salt made in Scotland should be exempted for seven years from the English duty. But from the expiration of the said seven years, shall be subject to the same duties as salt made in England. [That Scotland shall, after the said seven years, remain exempted from the duty of two shillings and sixpence on home salt, imposed by an act made in the ninth and tenth year of king William III. and if the parliament of Great-Britain shall at, or before, the expiration of the said seven years, substitute any other fund in the place of the said two shillings and four-pence of excise upon the bushel of home salt, Scotland shall, after the expiration of the said seven years, bear a proportion of the said fund, and have an equivalent in the terms of this treaty.] No salt whatsoever shall be brought from Scotland to England by land under certain penalties denounced: and for establishing an equality in trade, it was provided, that all flesh exported from Scotland to England, and shipped in Scotland to be exported beyond sea; and provisions for ships in Scotland and foreign voyages, may be salted with Scotch salt, paying the duty for what salt is so employed, and the like quantity of fresh salt pays in England, and under the same penalties, forfeitures, and provisions for preventing frauds as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that for the encouragement of the herring fishery, there shall be allowed and paid to the subjects inhabitants of Great Britain, during the present allowances for other fisheries, ten shillings and five pence sterling for every barrel of white herrings which shall be exported from Scotland; and that they shall be allowed five shillings sterling for every barrel of beef or pork salted with foreign salt, without mixture of British or Irish salts, and exported for sale from Scotland to parts beyond sea, alterable by the parliament of Great Britain.

IX. That whenever the sum of one million nine hundred, ninety-seven thousand, seven hundred, and sixty-three pounds, eight shillings, and four pence half-penny, shall be enacted by the parliament of Great Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, shall be charged with the additional sum of forty-eight thousand pounds, as the quota of Scotland for such tax; and so proportionally for any greater or lesser sum raised in England on land; the said quota to be assessed in the same manner as the assess now is in Scotland; but subject to such regulations as shall be made in the parliament of Great Britain.

X. That Scotland shall not be charged with the stamp-duties now in force in England.

XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

XII. Nor those on coals or culm.

XIII. Scotland shall not pay the malt duty during its continuance in England, which was to expire the twenty fourth of June 1707.

XIV. Scotland shall not be charged with any other duties imposed by the parliament of England before the union, except those consented to in this treaty: and if the parliament of England in their provision for the service of the year 1707 shall impose any farther customs, the Scots shall have an equivalent for the share thereof they may be liable to. [And Scotland shall not be charged with any imposition on malt made or consumed in that kingdom during the war.]

XV. Stipulates, that whereas by the terms of this treaty, the subjects of Scotland, for preserving an equality, of trade throughout the united kingdom, will be liable to several customs and excise now payable in England, which will be applicable towards paying the debts of England, payable before the union, it is agreed that an equivalent shall be made to Scotland for such part of the English debts, as Scotland may hereafter become liable to pay by reason of the union, other than such appropriations as have been made by parliament in England, of the customs and other duties on exports and imports, excises and all exciseable liquors, in respect of which debts equivalent are herein before provided; which equivalent is here stipulated to be three hundred ninety-eight thousand, eighty-five pounds ten shillings sterling, to be granted by the parliament of England in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained. The distinction of this equivalent is in the same article applied, 1. For indemnifying private persons from any losses they may sustain by reducing the coin of Scotland to the standard and value of that of England. 2. For indemnifying the sufferers in the late African and Indian company of Scotland. 3. For discharging the public debts of Scotland. 4. For improving the manufacture of the coarse wool of Scotland. 5. For encouraging and promoting the fisheries, and such other manufactures and improvements in Scotland, as may most conduce to the general good of the united kingdom: and for which end commissioners were to be appointed. [It seems the Scots were so inflamed by the destruction of their Darien and African company by the government of England, that nothing but the absolute assurance of an equivalent for reimbursing their whole capital employed in that affair, with interest, amounting to two hundred and thirty-two thousand, one hundred and sixty-two pounds, sixteen shillings and eleven pence halfpenny, could have induced them to agree to treat of the union, and they even insisted on the insertion of the above clause.] That if the said stock, capital and interest shall not be paid in twelve months after the commencement of the union, that then the said company may from henceforth trade, or give licence to trade until the said whole capital stock and interest shall be paid.

XVI. That the coin be of the same standard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland under the same rule as the mint of England.

XVII. That the same weights and measures be used throughout the united kingdoms as are now used in England; and standards shall be kept in the burghs, agreeable to the standard of the English exchequer.

XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, custom, and such excises as Scotland is to be liable to, shall be the same as those in England. Other laws in Scotland to remain as before the union, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the same throughout the united kingdom; but no alteration shall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for the evident utility of the subjects of Scotland.

XIX. The court of session and other courts shall remain in Scotland the same as before the union, subject nevertheless to such regulations, for the administration of public justice, as shall be made by the parliament of Great Britain; and that hereafter none shall be named by her majesty or her royal successors to be ordinary lords of session, but such as have served in the college of justice as advocates or principal clerks of session for the space of five years, or as writers to the signet for the space of ten years, with this provision, that no writer to the signet be capable of being admitted a lord of session, unless he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law, before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the said office two years before he be named to be a lord of session, yet so as the qualification made or to be made, for capacitating persons to be named ordinary lords of session, may be altered by the parliament of Great Britain.

XX. That all heritable offices, superiorities, heritable jurisdictions, offices for life, and jurisdictions for life, be reserved to the owners thereof as rights of property, in the same manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland, this treaty, in any wise notwithstanding.

XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal burghs in Scotland, as they now are, shall remain entire after the union, and notwithstanding thereof.

XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, sixteen of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the union, shall sit and vote in the house of lords, and forty-five of the members of the representatives of Scotland in the house of commons in the parliament of Great Britain, the choice whereof to be according to the act passed in Scotland for that purpose; which act is hereby declared to be valid, as if it were a part of it, and engrossed in the treaty: and in case her majesty shall on the first of May 1707, declare this present parliament to be the first of Great Britain, the present parliament of England may be so on the part of England; and the sixteen peers and the forty-five commoners for Scotland to sit with them; such parliament to continue no longer than the English parliament is allowed to continue.

XXIII. That the aforesaid sixteen peers of Scotland, mentioned in the preceding article, to sit in the house of lords in the parliament of Great Britain, shall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they or any peers of Great Britain shall have after the union, and particularly the right of sitting upon the trial of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their successors to their honours and dignities, shall, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and have rank and precedence next, and immediately after the peers of the orders and degrees in England at the time of the union on, and before all peers of Great Britain of the like orders and degree, who shall be created after the union.

XXIV. That from and after the union there shall be one great-seal for the united kingdom of Great Britain, which shall be different from the great-seal now used in either kingdom; and that the quarter of the arms, as well as the rank and precedence of Lyon king at arms in Scotland, shall be left to her majesty; and that in the private seal, signet, cassel, &c. now used in Scotland, be continued; but that the said seals be altered and adapted to the union, as her majesty shall think fit: that the crown, sceptre, and sword of state, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and records whatsoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they shall so remain, in all time coming, notwithstanding the union.

Such were the articles agreed to and signed by the respective commissioners of England and Scotland. They immediately waited on the queen with the treaty; and lord-keeper Cowper, in the name of the English commissioners, made a speech to her majesty, congratulating her on the conclusion of a negotiation, which had so happily united the different parts of this island under the same monarchy. The earl of Seafield, lord-chancellor of Scotland, spoke to the same effect on the part of the commissioners of that kingdom; and her majesty was pleased to return the following answer.

"My Lords,

"I give you many thanks for the great pains you have taken in this treaty, and am very well pleased to find your endeavours and applications have brought it to so good a conclusion: the particulars of it seem so reasonable that I hope they will meet with approbation in the parliaments of both kingdoms. I wish therefore my servants of Scotland may lose no time in going down to propose it to my subjects in that kingdom; and I shall always look upon it as a particular happiness if this union (which will be so great a security and advantage to both kingdoms) can be accomplished in my reign."

While the ministers of the two kingdoms were employed in establishing an union between their respective countries, the armies of the belligerent powers were carrying on their hostile attempts with great fury. Lewis XIV. had determined to exert his utmost efforts in the course of this campaign, and had accordingly sent very numerous forces into the field. His army in Flanders was commanded by the marshal de Villeroy, a nobleman of great generosity and a favourite at court; but an indiscreet general, blindly confident, and deaf to counsel. He formed the design of surprizing the duke of Marlborough before he could be joined by the Danes and Prussians, who were employed last year to act as auxiliaries. The French accordingly passed the Dyle early in May, and advanced directly towards the confederate army. It was in vain to hope that it was possible to surprize so vigilant a general as Marlborough. He was well informed of all their motions, and dispatched an express to the Danes to join him immediately, and was readily obeyed. Before this junction the allied army consisted of seventy-four battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty-three squadrons of horse and dragons, provided with one hundred pieces of cannon, twenty howitzers, and forty-two pontoons. About the same time the Danes joined the allied army, that of the French was joined by the marshal Marfin's horse, and by this addition their army amounted to seventy-fix battalions and one hundred and thirty-two squadrons. This superiority determined Villeroy to give battle to the allied army, though he knew his hopes of surprizing the active Marlborough were rendered abortive.

The allies moved forward to meet the enemy, who had now taken possession of the strong camp of Mont

St. André, their right extending to the Mahaigne, and their left to Anderkirk, the villages of Offuz and Ramillies being in the center. On the twelfth of May, about two in the afternoon, the allied army was drawn up in order of battle, with the right wing near Foltz, on the brook Yause, and the left near the village of Franquennes, which was occupied by the enemy. The action was begun on the left of the allied army, who pushed a brigade of foot from their post on the Mahaigne. About the same time M. d'Auverquerque, the Dutch general, charged the French household troops at the head of the horse of the left wing. For near half an hour the success was doubtful; but a reinforcement coming up, the French retired. Lieutenant Scultz was now ordered, with twelve squadrons, and twenty pieces of cannon, to attack the village of Ramillies, which was strongly fortified with artillery. The attack was made with great vigour and resolution; and the enemy at last driven from the village, who endeavouring to make their retreat, were most of them killed or taken prisoners.

In the mean time the Dutch and Danish horse of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the foot in the right of the enemy, cut twenty battalions of them to pieces, and made themselves masters of their colours and artillery. The French now began to retreat in good order, covered by the cavalry of their left wing; but the English horse forcing their passage over the rivulet which separated them from the enemy, attacked them with so much intrepidity that they entirely abandoned their foot, who were now exposed to all the fury of the cavalry. The French now gave way on all sides, and it was not without difficulty that marshal Villeroy, and the elector of Bavaria saved themselves by flight. An accident which now happened completed the destruction of the French army. Several of the waggons of the vanguard happening to break down in a narrow pass, so obstructed the passage, that neither the baggage nor artillery could proceed, nor could the troops defile in order. The opportunity was not neglected by the victorious horse; they pressed upon them so vigorously, that the French king's own regiment of foot called for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours. The pursuit was continued with great success about five miles from the field of battle.

Few battles recorded in history were more complete than this of Ramillies: the greater part of the enemy's cannon and baggage fell into the hands of the allies, with above an hundred and twenty colours, and several pair of kettle-drums. The French lost about forty thousand men, near one half of their army; while the loss of the allies was not more than two thousand. Louvain, Mechlin, Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, and Bruges, all opened their gates to the victors. Ostend, Menin, Dendermonde, and Aeth, surrendered after a short resistance.

Nor was this the only misfortune attended the arms of France during this famous campaign. Turin was besieged by the duke de Feuillade, who, like Villeroy, was more capable of making a figure at court, than at the head of an army. Chamillard, his father-in-law, had exhausted the treasury to support this expedition; but the siege was ill-directed and of long continuance. The city was, however, at last reduced to extremity, and the duke of Savoy had joined prince Eugene, who commanded the army in Italy. They advanced to the relief of the city, dispersed the French army commanded by the duke of Orleans, who commanded in the trenches, took all the provisions, baggage, and military chest, made themselves masters of Piedmont, and soon after of the rest of the Spanish territories in Italy. The faults of Feuillade, added to a secret order of the court, which forbade him to advance against the enemy, if they offered to relieve Turin, were the causes of this ruinous defeat.

The affairs of France were equally unsuccessful in Spain. Philip, assisted by the marshal de Tesse, laid siege to Barcelona early in the spring. The city was defended by Charles, his rival, in person. The siege was carried on with the utmost vigour, and the place at last reduced to extremity. The earl of Peterborough advanced to its relief at the head of two thousand men; but finding it impossible to enter the city, he took post on a neighbouring hill, and harassed the besiegers with perpetual skirmishes. The siege was, however, pressed with such vigour, that it was thought impossible for the besieged to hold out many days, when the news of the approach of the English fleet obliged the French admiral, who had blocked up the place by sea, to retire. Philip, however, seemed determined to carry on his approaches, even after the combined fleets of England and Holland came to an anchor in the bay: but the next morning he raised the siege in a very disorderly manner, leaving behind him all his tents, and great part of his military stores, together with his sick and wounded. The marshal de Tessé recommended the latter to the care of the earl of Peterborough. He could not have applied to a more humane general. The sick and wounded felt the lenient hand of compassion, and were used with the greatest tenderness. In the mean time, lord Galway took several Spanish towns, and penetrated to the capital itself, which was abandoned at his approach; but Charles protracting his stay in Arragon, notwithstanding repeated expresses, lord Galway was obliged to abandon Madrid, and retire before the Spanish army.

While great part of Europe was desolated by the sword of war, England and Scotland were engaged in treating of a union between the two kingdoms. The Scottish parliament met on the third of October, when the queen's letter was read, acquainting them, that the commissioners appointed to treat of an union between the two kingdoms had finished the treaty, and hoped the articles would prove acceptable to her subjects of Scotland: that an entire and perfect union would be the solid foundation of a lasting peace; it would secure their religion, their liberties, and their properties; remove the animosities that prevailed among themselves, and the jealousies that subsisted between the two nations. She renewed her assurance of maintaining the government of the church; and told them they had now an opportunity of taking such steps as might be thought necessary after the union: desired the necessary supplies till the parliament of Great-Britain could provide for those matters: and observed, that the great success with which it had pleased God to bless her majesty's arms, afforded a nearer prospect of a happy peace, with which they would enjoy the full advantages of this union: and concluded with recommending calmness and unanimity in debating on this great and weighty affair, of such important consequence to the whole island of Great-Britain.

But though the union was so useful in the system of government, and so necessary to the well-being of the state, it met with the most violent opposition in the Scottish parliament. All parties seemed at first united to oppose it. The presbyterians imagined their religion would be lost; and the Jacobites were enraged to see the pretender forever excluded from the crown. The nobility were shocked at the loss of their best privileges, by the total abolition of their parliament. The merchants trembled for their commerce, notwithstanding the advantageous liberty of trading to the English colonies. The nation in general considered itself as robbed of its rights, given up to slavery, and sold to a foreign power. The duke of Hamilton, who headed the party that opposed the union, made a most vehement speech against the treaty. "What!" cried he, "shall we abandon in the space of one half hour, what our ancestors have maintained for so many ages at the expence of their lives and fortunes? Are there here no descendants of those brave patriots, who defended the liberty of their country against every assault? Where are the barons, where are the peers, who once joined their breasts as a bulwark to the nation? Shall we sacrifice the sovereignty, the independency of our country, when our constituents call upon us to defend them; when they promise us support?" Others observed, that to consent to the treaty would be to overturn the constitution of the kingdom; that every people had their fundamental laws, which no authority could invade; that the existence of the rights of parliament forming an essential part of the state, the parliament itself had no right to dispense with them: that the whole body of individuals ought to concur in the sacrifice of their privileges; and that a sacrifice of that kind was most palpably pernicious.

The clamour without doors was still greater than within; the presbyterian preachers employed all their power and credit to rouse the resentment of their hearers against the treaty; nor did they labour in vain. The populace, transported with fury, erected the standard of rebellion, burnt the articles of the union publicly, published a manifesto, and declared they intended to dissolve the parliament. Even in the capital itself the people grew mutinous, and assaulted the house of Sir Patrick Johnson, provost of Edinburgh, and one of the commissioners of the union; nor did the person of the high-commissioner escape insult, the rabble throwing stones into his coach as he passed through the streets though surrounded by his guards. These tumults alarmed the ministry, and it was thought necessary to march several regiments of horse and dragoons into the north of England, that they might be in readiness should the enraged multitude break out into open rebellion. At last, however, affairs took a more favourable turn; whether the influence of the court or the means of corruption prevailed over the national spirit; whether the advantages of the union appeared in the end to over-balance its inconveniences, and the first alarms subsiding, reason and argument took place, or whether all these operated in concert, the Scottish parliament ratified all the articles with some slight alterations. Thus was a project that had been long wished by all the thinking parts of the inhabitants of both kingdoms, and which had been several times attempted in vain, fully completed. Real utility will, sooner or later, prevail, and every thing rests in the power of government, if that power be steadily exerted with wisdom.

The English parliament met on the third of December, when the queen in her speech to both houses, congratulated them on the glorious success of the British arms; desired the commons would grant such supplies as would enable her to improve those successes; and concluded with recommending dispatch in public affairs, as the surest method of convincing our friends and enemies of the vigour and firmness of our proceedings.

This speech was very pleasing to the parliament, and affectionate addresses were presented by both houses. The commons, after examining the estimates, voted near six millions for the ensuing year; and when the speaker presented the money bills to her majesty, he told her, that as the glorious victory obtained by the duke of Marlborough at Ramillies was gained before it could be supposed the armies were in the field, so the commons had granted supplies to her majesty before the enemy could well know that the parliament were sitting. The parliament also voted their thanks to the duke of Marlborough for the eminent services he had done his country during the last campaign, and then adjourned to the twenty-eighth of January.

A. D. 1708. On the day the parliament met after their adjournment, her majesty came to the house of peers, and, in a speech to both houses, observed, that the treaty of union, with some small alterations and additions, was ratified by the Scottish parliament; that she had ordered it to be laid before them, and hoped it would meet with their approbation and concurrence; desired the commons would provide for the the payment of the equivalent in case the treaty was ratified; and addressing herself to both houses, concluded in the following manner:

"You have now an opportunity before you of putting the last hand to a happy union of the two kingdoms, which I hope will be a lasting blessing to the whole island, a great addition to its wealth and power, and a firm security to the protestant religion.

"The advantages that will accrue to us all from an union are so apparent, that I will add no more, but that I shall look upon it as a particular happiness, if this great work, which has been so often attempted without success, can be brought to perfection in my reign."

On the third of February, the commons formed themselves into a committee of the whole house on the treaty of union; when it was opposed, with the utmost violence by the tory party. Sir John Packington observed, that the union might be compared to a forced marriage, where the woman does not consent. "An act like this," said he, "produced by corruption within doors, and by violence without, can never be permanent. The queen obliged by her coronation oath to maintain the church of England, hath now farther engaged herself to support the presbyterian kirk of Scotland. How can two objects so incompatible be conciliated in the same kingdom? How can two nations differing in a matter so essential be united?" He concluded with observing, that the church of England being established "jure divino," and the Scots pretending that the kirk was also "jure divino," he desired the convocation might be consulted on this critical circumstance.

Colonel Mordaunt answered Sir John Packington. He began with observing, that for his part he knew of no other "jure divino" than God's permission, and in this sense the church of England and the kirk of Scotland might both be said to be "jure divino," because God had permitted the former to prevail in England, and the latter in Scotland. "The member who spoke last," continued the colonel, "may, if he pleases, consult the convocation, for his own particular information; but I believe the commons stand in no need of such instruction: they are sufficient judges of the propriety of their own measures; and in any event it would be derogatory to the rights of the commons of England to ask, on this occasion, the advice of any inferior assembly, who had no share in the legislature."

The debate was continued for a considerable time with great spirit; till the tory members, finding there was a very considerable majority against them, quitted the house. All opposition was now at an end: the commons examined the treaty article by article; and on the eleventh of February approved of the whole.

The lords took the treaty into consideration on the fifteenth of February, and the debates were more solemn, and carried on with more deliberation than they had been in the lower house. Lord Haversham observed, that the articles came to their lordships with the greatest countenance of authority that it was possible for any thing to receive; but authority, though the strongest motive to restrain the will, was certainly the weakest in the world to convince the understanding. He was not, he said, against a federal union, a union in interest and in the succession; but this was a matter of a different nature: the question was, whether two nations, independent in their sovereignties, with distinct laws and interest, and, which is not to be forgotten, of different forms of worship, church-government, and order, shall be united into one kingdom? That, in his opinion, this was an union composed of so many dissimilar pieces, of such jarring, incongruous ingredients, that he feared it would require a standing force to keep the whole from falling asunder, and breaking to pieces every moment. He farther observed, that by this act, an hundred Scots peers, and as many commanders, were excluded the British parliament; gentlemen who as little thought of being excluded a year or two before as any of their lordships did then; that their rights were as well and as strongly secured to them as their lordships were at that time, by the fundamental laws of their kingdom, by the claim of right, and by act of parliament, whereby it was made high-treason to make any alteration in the constitution of the kingdom. He said that the union was contrary to the sense of the Scottish nation, as was sufficiently evident from the murmurs of all ranks of people while the treaty was under consideration by that parliament. But the argument on which he laid the greatest stress, was the injury the good old English constitution, justly allowed to be the most equal and best poised government in the world, might suffer by having the weight of sixty-one Scottish members, and those too returned by a Scottish privy-council, thrown into the scale.

It was easy to refute these arguments. Great affairs wear many different aspects. The advantages and disadvantages appear in contrast; when the former preponderate, they ought to determine the debate. "The security and tranquillity of the kingdom," said one of the advocates for the union, "will evidently be the fruits of this treaty. Our inveterate enemies, France and Popery, will be no longer formidable, when Great-Britain is united into one body. With respect to ecclesiastical affairs, a wise and moderate government may put an end to disputes. Are not the Swiss cantons united, though of different religions? And is not the German diet a proof that diversity of creeds is no obstacle to political union?" A treaty supported by reason, and opposed only by weak objections, naturally carried the majority of votes. The parliament approved the union; and experience soon made those phantoms vanish, which imagination had raised against the good of the public. A bill of ratification was now brought in, and having passed both houses, received the royal assent on the fourth of March, when the queen made the following speech to both houses.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with the greatest satisfaction I have given my assent to a bill for uniting England and Scotland into one kingdom.

"I consider their union as a matter of great importance to the wealth, strength, and safety of the whole island; and, at the same time, a work of so much difficulty and nicety in its own nature, that, till now, all attempts that have been made towards it, in the course of above one hundred years, have proved ineffectual; and therefore I make no doubt but it will be remembered and spoke of hereafter to the honour of those who have been instrumental in bringing it to such a happy conclusion. I desire and expect from all my subjects of both nations, that from henceforth they act with all possible respect and kindness one to another, that so it may appear to all the world they have hearts disposed to be one people.

"This will be a great pleasure to me, and will make us all quickly sensible of the good effects of this union.

"And I cannot but look upon it as a particular happiness, that in my reign so full a provision is made for the peace and quiet of my people, and for the security of our religion, by so firm an establishment of the protestant succession throughout Great-Britain.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I take this occasion to remind you of making effectual provision for the payment of the equivalent to Scotland within the time appointed by the act; and am persuaded you will shew as much readiness in this particular, as you have done in all the parts of this great work.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The season of the year being now pretty far advanced, I hope you will continue the same zeal, which has appeared throughout this session, in dispatching what yet remains of the public business before you."

Thus

Thus this great design, so long wished and laboured for in vain, was brought to a happy conclusion, and a final period put to those fatal quarrels that had so often desolated great part of both kingdoms. The miscarriage of their settlement at Darien had convinced the merchants of Scotland, that every attempt of a similar kind must be rendered abortive; while they were opposed by their more powerful neighbour; and this consideration rendered them very desirous of an union with England; especially as their sister kingdom offered to reimburse them the expences that had attended their making that settlement. The thinking part of the nation had long observed, that Scotland was entirely at the mercy of the ministry, and that every new set of ministers made use of that power to enrich themselves and their creatures at the expence of the public; that the judges being made by them, were so dependent on their will, that in Scotland, where no juries were impanelled in civil causes, the whole property of the kingdom was in their hands, and at their disposal. Experience had also convinced them, that it was of no consequence to complain to the English council. The indigent noblemen and more indigent burghers formed a very considerable majority in the Scottish parliament, and were easily brought over to the interest of the court by promises and rewards. The only method, therefore, of removing these disorders, was that of an incorporating union with England. The court was engaged to support the union, in order to avert the dreadful blow with which they were threatened for passing the act of security in the year 1704. The lord treasurer, to whom the passing that act was chiefly imputed, had been threatened with an impeachment. He therefore exerted all his interest with the utmost alacrity and zeal, to complete a treaty, on which his own power, as well as the happiness of both kingdoms, in a great measure, depended. The court of France was reduced to so much distress, that it was impossible for them to give the Scots any assistance, either in men or money. These various incidents acting in concert, brought this great work to a happy conclusion; and hence the reason is sufficiently evident why the many attempts made at different times, and in different reigns, proved abortive: nothing but so remarkable a conjunction of incidents could now have rendered the design effectual.

The king of France, though long unfortunate, determined to make another attempt to recover his affairs, and, if possible, procure an honourable peace. He sent fresh troops into Spain, however necessary they might be in Flanders, where the victorious Marlborough triumphed over every opposition. The duke of Berwick, natural son to James II. commanded the army of Philip, and advanced to Almanza; while the allies, under the command of lord Galway, marched to meet the enemy. On the fourteenth of April, the two armies were in sight of each other, and a general engagement was now unavoidable. This was the most fatal battle the allies suffered during the whole war; and the following account of it was published by authority.

“Our army entered the plain of Almanza about noon, formed into a line of battle, and marched in that position till they came within a mile of the enemy. Lord Galway, to supply our want of cavalry, had interlined a brigade of foot with each wing of horse: but the enemy having drawn from the left some squadrons to reinforce the right wing, lord Tyrawley, who commanded on the left wing, ordered the Portuguese horse of the left of the rear-line, commanded by the count of Attalaya, to double into our first line, in order to make an equal front with the enemy.

“About three in the afternoon the earl of Galway posted himself at the head of the English dragoons, and advanced to begin the battle with the enemy's right wing of horse; the Portuguese being ordered to take the charge as it should come to them from the left, but not before the English and Dutch were actually engaged. While we were advancing, the enemy began to play upon us from a battery on a rising ground; nearly in the front of their right; but our troops pressing on to come to a close engagement; the cannon on either side did very little execution; and a detachment of dragoons being sent, under colonel Dormer, to attack the enemy's battery, they retired, with their artillery, with great precipitation. As soon as our left wing was advanced within an hundred paces of the enemy's horse, they also advanced out of their line to meet our charge, and the engagement soon became very bloody and obstinate on both sides. The enemy, by the weight of their squadrons, forced ours to retreat some paces; but two regiments of foot, on the left of that brigade which was interlined with the horse in the first line, coming up, threw in their fire upon the enemy's flank and rear; and our cavalry, at the same time, renewing their charge in front, they were drove, in disorder, through their own lines, with great slaughter.

“By this time the English and Dutch foot, who formed the center of our army, under the command of lieutenant-general Erle and baron Freyheim, were sharply engaged, and broke through the enemy's first and second lines, bearing down all before them as far as the walls of Almanza: but this success was not of long duration; for the enemy's squadrons of the second line fell upon their flank, and forced our infantry back with great loss.

“The enemy observing that the cavalry of our right did not advance with our left wing, detached some squadrons to fall upon the Portuguese, who formed the right wing, under the command of the marquis das Minas. These troops, in the most dastardly manner, gave way upon the first charge; the whole horse of the right wing fled, and abandoned their infantry, who were most of them either killed or taken prisoners. The battle still continued on our left wing, the enemy still charging us with fresh squadrons, but without success; which the duke of Berwick perceiving, he sent nine battalions, most of them French, who drew up before the first line of Spanish horse, to oppose our brigade of foot, consisting of five regiments. At the same time, he brought up several fresh squadrons, to make another charge upon our left wing of horse. The count de Attalaya, who commanded the Portuguese horse that were mixed with our dragoons, was carried off wounded. Our troops were now attacked on every side; and being left naked in the flanks by the cowardly flight of the Portuguese wing, were surrounded and hemmed in on all sides.

“In this dreadful situation, they formed themselves into a hollow square, and retired from the field of battle. Had they been able to make good their retreat, the enemy would have had no great cause to boast of the victory, the loss on both sides being nearly equal; but the men, after marching nine hours without any refreshment, and fighting about six, were faint with fatigue: all their ammunition was spent; they saw themselves abandoned by their own horse, and in a country to which they were utter strangers; destitute of provisions, and cut off from all hopes of a supply. These considerations induced them to surrender themselves, amounting to thirteen battalions, prisoners of war. They accordingly dispatched a messenger to the duke of Berwick, desiring honourable terms, which were very readily granted. The duke, who believed this body beyond his reach, immediately dispatched the count d'Asfeldt to receive their surrender, on these conditions: that they should be prisoners of war till exchanged; that they should be all disarmed, except the officers, who were to keep their swords; and that they should have liberty to send for their baggage before they marched any farther. The Portuguese, and part of the English horse that guarded the baggage, retreated to Alcira.”

In this fatal action, the allies lost above ten thousand men, two thousand of whom were left dead on the field of battle, and among those several officers of distinction. Lord Galway himself was wounded in the face, and several others very dangerously. The loss of the enemy on the field was nearly equal to that of the confederates. The provinces of Valentia and Arragon were reduced, and the campaign was closed with the taking of Lerida, which happened on the second of November. Catalonia was now the only province in Spain that remained to Charles; all the rest of his conquests having been lost by the fatal battle of Almanza.

In the mean time, Villars became formidable in Germany; but France was still in danger. The duke of Savoy and prince Eugene passed the Var, and besieged Toulon. The combined fleets of England and Holland, under the command of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, blocked up the place by sea, and assisted in the reduction of this important place. Had the enterprise succeeded, Provence would have been lost, and the allies might have carried the conquest much farther into France. But the operations were not pushed with that vigour that seems to command success. The secret of the expedition had not been kept, and a powerful reinforcement arrived before the place could be taken. It was therefore determined to raise the siege, but not before they had left evident marks of their visit. Orders were therefore issued for a general bombardment, both by sea and land. This dreadful farewell greatly distressed the enemy: eight ships of the line were burnt in the harbour, twenty-three were sunk at the entrance of the mole, few of which could ever be recovered; several magazines, and above sixty houses, were destroyed in the city; and the devastations committed in the adjacent country were estimated at near five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

But England suffered a still greater misfortune, Sir Cloudesley Shovel, in his return with the fleet to England, ran upon the rocks of Scilly, where his own ship, the Association, together with that of the Eagle, Firebrand, and Romney, were lost, and all the crews perished.

The campaign in the Netherlands produced no actions of consequence. Marlborough had made a journey to Leipzig, where he endeavoured to bring over Charles XII. of Sweden to the interest of the allies. His negotiation was fruitless; and when he returned, and put himself at the head of the allied army, the French refused to fight; nor was it in his power to force them to an engagement.

The first parliament of Great-Britain met at Westminster on the twenty-third of October, and the session was opened by her majesty with a speech from the throne. She told them, that she did not doubt but they came with hearts prepared to make the union so prosperous, that it might answer the most sanguine expectations of her subjects, and the reasonable apprehensions of her enemies; that nothing was so material as to convince their foes by demonstrating, that the uniting their interests had not only improved their abilities, but also their resolutions to prosecute the war with vigour, till an honourable peace could be obtained.

She observed, that though the attempt upon Toulon had not been attended with the desired success, it had not been wholly without effect. She mentioned the loss we had sustained in Spain, and the operations of the war in Italy; and requested the supplies necessary for prosecuting the war during the approaching campaign. Then directing her discourse to the late union, she said, "It is impossible but some doubts and difficulties must have arisen on account of that measure, which, however, she hoped, were so far overcome, as to have defeated the designs of those who would have made use of that handle to foment disturbances." After recommending several particulars rendered necessary to be provided for by the articles of union; she concluded with assuring them, "that nothing should be wanting on her part to procure her people all the blessings that could follow from that happy circumstance of her reign, and to extinguish the least occasion of jealousy; that either the civil or religious rights of any part of her united kingdom could suffer by the consequences of the union; and hoped they would suffer nothing to prevail with them to dispute among themselves, or abate their zeal in opposing the common enemy."

Both houses presented very affectionate addresses to her majesty, and voted near six millions for the service of the ensuing year. They afterwards presented an address to her majesty, against making any peace, as it could not be favourable to her and her allies, while Spain and the West Indies, or any part of the Spanish monarchy remained in the hands of the house of Bourbon.

Lewis XIV. after trying every method to induce the allies to accept his offers for a general peace, resolved to attempt an invasion of Great Britain. He knew that the generality of the Scots were exasperated by the union, and flattered himself that they would readily join a French army to place the son of the late abdicated monarch on the English throne. He was not deceived with regard to the Scots. Highly averse to an incorporating union with England, they could not, without the highest indignation, behold themselves reduced to a state of dependence upon the English; and thought no means so likely to shake off the yoke as that of bringing about a revolution in the government. Lewis accordingly received the most flattering promises of joining his army with thirty thousand men completely armed, if he would land a small army in their country.

Desirous of embracing every method to distress the English, Lewis collected a fleet at Dunkirk, consisting of eight ships of the line, and seventy transports, on board of which six thousand men were embarked for an invasion of Scotland. The troops were commanded by the count de Gracé, and the fleet by the chevalier de Fourbin Janson, one of the best sea officers of his time. Could these troops have been landed in Scotland it might have been attended with very disagreeable consequences, there not being above three thousand regular troops in that kingdom, while England was absolutely defenceless, her forces being engaged on the continent.

A large fleet of ships under the command of Sir George Byng, was stationed off Dunkirk. Several regiments of foot, and some squadrons of cavalry arrived from Flanders, and marched immediately towards the borders of Scotland. The habeas corpus act was suspended, and a proclamation was issued, declaring the pretender, his accomplices and adherents, rebels and traitors.

A strong gale of wind having driven the English admiral from his station into the Downs, the French admiral took the opportunity of sailing from Dunkirk, directing his course towards Scotland. Sir George was soon informed of the escape of the enemy; and entered the Frith of Edinburgh only a few hours after the French. The sudden appearance of the English so intimidated the enemy, that they immediately crowded all the sail they could carry, and favoured at once by the darkness of the night and a fresh gale from the shore, and escaped. The Salisbury, a ship the French had taken some time before, fell into the hands of the English. Several of the Scottish nobility were arrested; and Lewis gained no other reputation than that of adding a rash enterprise to his other misfortunes.

The only inconvenience that attended this attempt was a considerable run upon the bank, which it was feared would affect the credit of the nation. The commons immediately voted, "that whoever designedly endeavoured to destroy or lessen the public credit, especially at a time when the kingdom was in danger of an invasion, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor, and an enemy to her majesty and the nation." The lord treasurer also signified to the bank, that her majesty would allow for six months, an interest of six per cent. upon their bills. This advantageous proposal induced several opulent noblemen and merchants to offer them very considerable sums; and the directors having called in twenty per cent. on their capital stock, they were soon in a condition to answer all the demands made upon them by the timorous, the envious, or the disaffected.

Lewis, equally chagrined by adversity as elated with success, made strong efforts to triumph over fortune. Notwithstanding his losses were immense he still found resources. An army of one hundred thousand men, commanded by the duke of Burgundy, assisted by the duke of Vendome, was to retrieve the honour of the French arms in the Low Countries. But these generals, unfortunately for Lewis, were of different dispositions; the former pious, the latter licentious, and consequently agreed but ill with each other. They, however, surprized Ghent and Bruges; advanced into Dutch Flanders, and laid the country under contribution.

Marlborough immediately wrote to prince Eugene, desiring he would hasten his march and join him, being determined to give the enemy battle, though the allied army was inferior in number to the enemy, as the only method, in his opinion, to prevent their farther progress, which might otherwise end with cutting off the communication of the allies with Brabant. The prince had no sooner joined the army than it was determined to pass the Dender and offer the enemy battle. Confident of success from their superiority of numbers, the French invested Oudenarde, from a persuasion that they should be able to take it before the prince could join Marlborough's army. They were deceived. The allies marched with surprizing expedition, and the French thought to raise the siege at their approach. The duke of Vendome was for drawing up the army in order of battle; but was opposed by the duke of Burgundy, who resolved to continue his march. But an incident soon convinced him that it was now impossible to avoid an engagement. General Cadogan, at the head of sixteen battalions and eight squadrons, fell upon seven battalions of foot posted in the village of Heynem, a little below Oudenarde upon the Schelde. The attack was made with so much success, that the enemy was soon driven out of the village, and being pursued with a close fire, a whole brigade threw down their arms, and surrendered themselves prisoners. The duke of Burgundy now endeavoured to disengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles through which they were marching, in order to draw them up in the plain; but the confederate generals were too experienced to give him time to effect his purpose: their army was already formed in order of battle, and advanced to the charge with great alacrity. The enemy faced about and formed, but with great disorder, which was increased by the misunderstanding that prevailed between their two generals, the duke of Burgundy continually countermarching what the duke of Vendome had ordered.

About four in the afternoon the battle began, and continued with great firmness till ten at night. The confederates had the advantage in every attack, and drove the enemy from one post to another, till night put an end to the combat. The foot were principally engaged in this action, the broken ground rendering it very difficult for the horse to act. Marlborough perceived it, and detached the greater part of his cavalry from the right and left wing to a very considerable distance, where they fell upon the enemy both in flank and rear with such impetuosity, that the French were thrown into confusion, part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynse and Ghent, and another part to Couray. The duke de Vendome, seeing the forces flying in every part, formed a rear-guard of about twenty-five squadrons, and the same number of battalions, with which he secured the retreat of his forces. This precaution proved the safety of the whole French army; for the next morning at day-break the duke of Marlborough detached a large body of horse and foot, under the command of the lieutenant-generals Bulau and Lutley, to pursue the fugitives; but the prudence of the duke de Vendome prevented them from executing their design.

In this action, which was called the battle of Oudenarde, about four thousand of the enemy were left dead on the field of battle, two thousand deserted, and about eight thousand were taken prisoners, including a great number of officers. The allies also took ten pieces of cannon, about one hundred standards, eight pair of kettle-drums, and four thousand horse. The loss of the confederates did not exceed two thousand men.

It was not at all surprizing that two such great generals as Marlborough and Eugene, who always acted in concert, should defeat an army more numerous than their own; but all Europe was astonished when they saw them lay siege to Lille, in sight of a formidable army, which might at least carry off their convoys, and by that means reduce them to the last extremity, if they did not attack them in their entrenchments. But notwithstanding all these circumstances, the place was invested on the thirtieth of August; prince Eugene commanding on one side, and the prince of Orange on the other, while Marlborough encamped at Helchin to cover the siege. Lille was the strongest town in Flanders, furnished with ammunition, and every necessary, and the garrison had been lately reinforced with one and twenty battalions of the best troops in France, commanded by marshal Boufflers.

The siege was pushed with the utmost vigour, while every effort was made by the French to oblige the confederates to abandon the undertaking. The dukes of Burgundy and Vendome marched towards the duke of Marlborough, and for some days cannonaded his camp: but finding all their endeavours to bring him to an engagement fruitless, and not daring to attack him in his strong camp, they retired, and determined for the future to employ their troops in cutting off the convoys coming with provisions and ammunition for the besiegers; and in covering those provinces which were exposed to the incursions of the allies.

Marlborough had detached six thousand men to cover the march of seven hundred waggons coming from Ostend with supplies to prince Eugene's camp. The duke of Burgundy had information of this convoy, and sent an army of twenty-two thousand men to intercept it. But the small detachment that guarded the waggons, made so noble a defence, under the command of major-general Webb, that they obliged the enemy to retire with the loss of seven thousand men killed on the spot. This action is generally called the battle of Wynendale, and was one of the most glorious achievements performed during the whole course of the war. It was also of the utmost importance to the allies; for had the convoy been taken, they must have raised the siege.

The siege was now carried on with such vigour and success, that on the twenty-second of October the town was surrendered, and the garrison retired into the citadel, where they made a gallant defence till the eighth of December, when the marshal delivered up the place, the garrison marched out with all the honours of war, and were escorted to Douay. At the same time the duke of Savoy was master of the passes leading to Dauphiny. The emperor Joseph, brother to the archduke Charles, was in possession of Landau, one of the keys of France. Paris trembled, and the whole kingdom was thrown into the utmost confusion.

Philip V. whose destiny fluctuated on the tide of events, could not be much happier than Lewis XIV. The emperor had already taken from him Naples and and Lombardy. The English had taken Sardinia for the emperor, and the island of Minorca for themselves. Pope Clement XI. in alliance with the family of Bourbon, took up arms against Joseph; but was soon obliged to lay them down, and acknowledged the archduke Charles, king of Spain. The duke of Orleans, who commanded the army in Spain, had indeed some success; but his misfortunes were greater than his acquisitions; and the fidelity of the Catalonians had many heavy flocks to maintain.

While victory attended the allies in every quarter, the queen had the misfortune to lose her husband, the prince of Denmark. He died about ten in the morning on the twenty-eighth of October, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was a prince of a very amiable character, without ambition or intrigue, and therefore incapable of giving offence to either party. He always contented himself with being the first subject, seldom interfering in business, though his office of lord high-admiral gave him a claim to a very considerable share. Her majesty, who had been the most tender and affectionate wife, was inconsolable for his loss.

A singular event that happened about this time engaged the attention of the nation. Count Matheoff, the Russian ambassador, was arrested in the street at the suit of one Morton, a laceman, and insolently treated by the bailiffs, who dragged him to a spunging-house; nor could he obtain his liberty till he was bailed by the earl of Feverham and a merchant in the city. This insult on the person of an ambassador was loudly complained of as an atrocious breach of the law of nations. Enraged at the insult, the ambassadors of the emperor, the king of Prussia, and those of several other powers, demanded redress. The Czar himself declared he would be satisfied with nothing less than the death of the offenders. The queen, who resented the injury as much as the Czar, was very desirous of making him satisfaction; but the laws of England admitted of no such punishment. She observed to the Czar that justice in this country is dispensed by the laws only; and no exception was found for a case of this nature. The judges of the queen's-bench granted informations against the laceman and thirteen others. They were found guilty, and the privileges of ambassadors again acknowledged; and the parliament passed a bill for securing the privileges of foreign ministers. The queen consented to make apologies by her ministers to the Russian court; and the Czar was satisfied. He could not help admiring, notwithstanding his despotism, that mild legislation which is so attentive to guard the meanest subject from the attacks of arbitrary power.

On the second of November the parliament met at Westminster, and the session was opened by commission, when the lord chancellor informed the house, "that the commissioners were appointed by her majesty to acquaint them, that she expected they would continue to prosecute the war with the same vigour and resolution, with which it had hitherto been conducted: that she hoped they would enable her to make such augmentation of her forces as they should judge necessary for preserving and improving the advantages which the allies had gained in the Netherlands: that she desired they would prepare such bills as might confirm and perfect the union: that if they would propose means for the advancement of trade and manufactures, she would take pleasure in enacting such provisions: and that as she had the most sincere regard for the preservation of their liberties and the support of the protestant succession, she would continue to exert her utmost endeavours to defeat the designs of the pretender and all his abettors.

Addresses of condolence on the death of her consort, and of congratulation on the success of her arms, were presented by both houses; and the commons voted above seven millions for the service of the ensuing year; this it was imagined would be sufficient to augment the army with ten thousand men, and procure new advantages over the armies of the grand disturber of Europe.

Several important affairs came under the consideration of parliament during this session, but the principal was the naturalization of foreign protestants. This proposition was debated with great spirit in both houses; and many forcible arguments were advanced on both sides of the question. The whigs supported the bill; the Tories opposed it. The former affirmed, that it would prove an effectual means of encouraging industry, improving trade and manufactures, and repairing the loss of men which the war had occasioned. They instanced the conduct of the king of Prussia, who, by inviting the French to settle in his dominions, had fertilized a barren and ill-peopled country, improved its trade and manufactures, augmented its revenues, and procured many other very considerable advantages. But the chief motive of the whigs for pushing this bill, was to throw an additional weight of foreigners into the balance against the landed interest. The opposers of this act of naturalization objected, that such a swarm of aliens might bring with them many dangerous consequences to the constitution; that it was, in fact, inviting so many spies and informers among us, since it could not be supposed they would leave all affection for their mother-country behind them, tho' they might gladly embrace, for the present, the asylum offered them in this kingdom. It was said, they would find means to insinuate themselves into many places of trust and profit, and even to seats in the great assembly of national representatives; and, by frequent intermarriages, contribute to the extinction of the English race. It was added, that they would greatly increase the number of our poor, already so great a burden to this country; and take out of the mouths of English tradesmen and labourers great part of the bread they now earned by their industry. These arguments, however powerful, were not sufficient to prevent the bill from passing both houses, and afterwards receiving the royal assent.

A. D. 1709. A motion being made in the house of commons for leaving out the prayer for the queen's having issue, on presumption that her majesty would continue a widow during the remainder of her life; Mr. Watson, son to lord Rockingham, moved to address the queen, "That he would not suffer her just grief to prevail so far; but that she would, in compliance with the earnest wishes of her people, entertain thoughts of a second marriage." This motion was carried, and presented to the queen, who returned for answer, "That the provision she had made for the protestant succession would always be a proof of her hearty concern for the happiness of the nation; but that the subject of their address was of such a nature, that she was persuaded they did not expect a particular answer."

A very severe winter had greatly increased the miseries of France. The olive trees in the southern provinces were destroyed, and the greater part of the fruit-trees killed by the frost. There were no hopes of a harvest, and very little corn in the granaries. The numerous armies of Lewis seemed to be perishing for want, and that haughty monarch was reduced to the necessity of imploring a peace. He offered to demolish Strasburg and Dunkirk, to abandon the pretender, to renounce all pretensions to the Spanish monarchy, to grant the states-general the barrier they demanded in the Low Countries, and to treat with the emperor, agreeable to the treaty of Ryswick. The more this proud monarch was humbled by distress, the more his misfortunes were insulted. Prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and the grand pensioner Hensius, united in the same political views, were wisely for reducing him to the last extremities. They were desirous of preventing him from troubling the repose of Europe for the future. Accordingly they demanded, that as he gave up the crown of Spain, he should take proper measures to see see it vacated, and even employ his troops for that purpose. This was a proposal nothing but the utmost distress could reduce the French monarch to accept. He absolutely refused it, and determined to carry on the war for some time longer, rather than submit to such unworthy conditions. "If I must use arms," (said he) "I should rather chuse to use them against mine enemies, than against my own children."

Lewis, on this occasion, had recourse to a very extraordinary measure. He laid the unreasonable demands of the allies before his people, in a circular letter; and after acquainting them with the additional burdens he was obliged to lay upon them, he endeavoured to excite their indignation, to rouse their honour, and even excite their pity. This produced the desired effect: the people resolved to expend their whole substance in defence of the honour of their king, and even to fight his battles without pay, rather than abandon him to the infamy of accepting such humiliating terms. The manufacturers and labourers, who wanted bread, turned soldiers: Villars was appointed commander in chief, Boufflers, tho' his senior, consenting to serve under him. This patriotic concession acquired him more honour than if he had been intrusted with the principal command.

On the twenty-second of June, the allied army assembled in the neighbourhood of Lille, amounting to one hundred and ten thousand men; and it was determined by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough to open the campaign immediately. Villars had taken possession of a very advantageous camp in the plain of Lans, where he threw up intrenchments, in order to act on the defensive. The allies, not chusing to attack the enemy in their intrenchments, opened the campaign with the siege of Tournay. The town itself made no great resistance; but the citadel was so strong, both by art and nature, and so gallantly defended by lieutenant-general Surville, at the head of four thousand men, that it held out a month against all the efforts of the allies, and was at last surrendered by an honourable capitulation.

Mons was now threatened by the victorious confederates; and Villars, in order to cover the place, posted himself behind the woods of la Merte and Trainiere, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The French amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand men; and the allies, who were now joined by the Hessians, to near the same number. On the ninth of September, the two armies were so near one another, that a cannonade began between them; and the allies perceiving that it would be impossible to invest Mons while the French army continued in its present situation, it was determined to attack the enemy in their intrenchments. Pursuant to this resolution, batteries were erected on the wings and in the center of the allied army, and every thing prepared for making the attempt.

General Schuylenburgh and the duke of Argyle began the attack about eight in the morning, at the head of eighty-six battalions, supported by two-and-twenty squadrons, commanded by count Lotum. The attack and resistance were equally obstinate; but the assailants at last prevailed, and the left wing of the French were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The right of the enemy, posted in the wood of la Merte, and secured by triple entrenchments, was next attacked by the prince of Orange and baron Fagel, at the head of thirty-six battalions of Dutch troops. The battle was here supported with the most desperate courage on both sides. The French were obliged to quit the first entrenchment, but were repulsed, with great slaughter from the second. But marshal Villars, having received a wound in his knee at the attack, was obliged to be carried from the field of battle. The loss of their commander greatly depressed the courage of the French, and their resistance, from that moment, became less vigorous. The prince of Orange having rallied his forces, returned to the charge, and soon drove the enemy from their intrenchments, and out of the wood into the plain, where their horse were all drawn up in proper order. The battle now became general, and the victory was disputed with great vigour till three in the afternoon; when the French began to give way, and were pursued, with great slaughter, to the desile of Bavay.

This was the dearest victory the allies purchased during the whole war; near eighteen thousand of their troops being slain on the field of battle, and among them several officers of distinction. The loss of the enemy did not amount to more than eight or nine thousand; but the disgrace of a total defeat, and even of being driven from their intrenched camp, struck such a panic into the French soldiers, that their generals did not think it prudent to make any farther attempt to save Mons, which surrendered about the middle of November, when both armies retired into winter quarters.

The parliament met on the fifteenth of November, and the queen opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which she told both houses, "That the enemy had, in the beginning of the year, endeavoured, by false appearances, and deceitful insinuations of a desire after peace, to create jealousies and divisions among the allies; but that they had been disappointed in their expectations, such measures having been taken as rendered it impossible for them to disguise their insincerity: that God had been pleased to bless the arms of the confederates with a most remarkable victory, and other successes, which had laid France open to the impression of the allied arms, and consequently rendered peace more necessary to that kingdom than it was at the beginning of the campaign: that she hoped they would enable her to prosecute the advantages she had gained, by reducing within proper limits that exorbitant and oppressive power, which had so long threatened the liberties of Christendom."

This speech was very agreeable to the parliament: they presented addresses of thanks to the queen for her speech from the throne, congratulated her on the success of her arms, and thanked the duke of Marlborough for his signal services. The commons were so eager for prosecuting the war with vigour, that they voted above six millions for the service of the ensuing year. These immense sums granted by parliament struck the court of France with terror; as they sufficiently demonstrated that the credit of England was in its full vigour, while their own was reduced to the lowest ebb. At the same time, it was evident that the English parliament was determined to carry on the war till the haughty Lewis was sufficiently humbled.

But while we were triumphing over Lewis, and France was mourning over her misfortunes, a very singular trial re-kindled the animosity of parties. Dr. Sacheverel, an enthusiastic preacher, a man of little knowledge and great prejudice, carried away by the spirit of party, which is too often, though very unjustly, called zeal, exerted his talents strongly in favour of passive obedience, and against the toleration of the non-conformists; insisting that the church was in danger, and that there was a necessity for taking proper measures for her defence. This was boldly attacking the principles of the whigs; the chief authors of the revolution; and gave occasion to the most violent debates. The house of commons voted Sacheverel's sermons to be scandalous and seditious libels, and impeached him before the house of lords of high crimes and misdemeanors.

A. D. 1710. The trial came on before the peers on the twenty-seventh of February. This trial continued near three weeks, during which time all business was suspended, and the capital thrown into the utmost ferment. The doctor was attended to and from Westminster, during the time of his trial, by multitudes of people, crying out, "God bless the church and Sacheverel." They even proceeded to such lengths, that they demolished several meeting-houses, and made bonfires in the streets with the materials, materials, with loud huzzas of "High-church and Sacheverel."

The debates in the house of lords became so interesting, that the queen herself was present. The earl of Wharton observed, that Sacheverel's doctrine of passive obedience might have the most serious and dangerous consequences; that the principle of resistance was the corner-stone of the revolution; that to suppose it unlawful, was to suppose a great part of the people, and the parliament itself, guilty of rebellion and injustice; that, of consequence, the present government could not be considered as lawful, because the queen's right was wholly derived from the revolution. Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, the famous partizan of William, justified resistance from history, both ancient and modern. He alledged the examples of the Maccabees, the Dutch, the conduct of Elizabeth in their behalf, and the succours granted to the Hugonots; adding, that though the contrary opinion had prevailed, those who affected to support it were the first to plead for resistance when they saw themselves oppressed. The bishop of Bath and Wells, who was more a tory in his principles than Burnet, agreed that resistance might be lawful in certain extraordinary cases; but added, that the doctrine ought not to be propagated among the people, who would be ready, on many occasions, to abuse it; and that the revolution, which should rather be called a "Vocation," ought not to be cited as an example; that the term, "original contract," if not used with great reserve, might inspire the most pernicious sentiments; and that obedience could not be preached with too much zeal, when resistance was supported by indiscreet apologies. These reflections irritated the duke of Argyle: he asserted, "that the clergy had, in all ages, abandoned the interests of the people, and extolled the majesty of kings, that they might govern them with greater ease; and that this was a sufficient reason why they should not interfere in political matters." Several of the most distinguished tories owned, that the doctor's sermons were extravagant and absurd; but insisted that they were not sufficient to condemn him. He was, however, found guilty by a majority of seven votes; on which he was suspended from the pulpit for three years, and his sermons condemned to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, together with the famous decree of the university of Oxford in favour of absolute authority and the irrevocable right of kings.

This sentence was thought so favourable by Sacheverel's party, that they considered it as a victory over the whigs. The queen herself seemed to favour a doctrine that tended to secure her throne, and to establish the public tranquillity. She now prorogued the parliament, after expressing her concern both for the time that had been lost on a private affair, and for the injurious supposition that the church was in danger under the government.

The last campaign having weakened still more the resources of France, Lewis XIV. once more sued for peace. The allies enjoyed the humiliation of his ambition. The negotiations were opened at the little town of Gertruydenberg, where the French ambassadors met with a thousand mortifications. It was in vain that Lewis made such offers as would have been shameful if necessity had not the same power over sovereigns as over common men. He even offered to furnish money sufficient to drive his grandson from the throne of Spain, in case he refused to abandon it, in exchange for a small dominion that should be assigned him. It was absolutely insisted upon, that Lewis himself should dethrone him by force of arms. This the French monarch refused, and the ambassadors returned to their respective countries.

The operations of the field were not suspended, even while the negotiations were carrying on. The forces of the allies were assembled, and the campaign was opened with the siege of Douay, which surrendered on the twenty-ninth of June, after a noble defence of two months. Marshal Villars had posted himself near Arras, and strongly fortified his camp. Marlborough did every thing in his power to bring the French to a general engagement, but without success: Villars acted with so much precaution, that he not only avoided a battle, but also prevented the allies from besieging Mons. There was, indeed, the utmost necessity for his acting in this prudent manner. Mons was the key of Picardy; and had that place been taken, the whole province had been wholly at the mercy of the confederates. Disappointed in their design against Mons, the allies invested Bethune, which, in about three weeks, surrendered. They also made themselves masters of St. Venant and Aire. The last surrendered on the tenth of November, when Marlborough put his troops into winter-quarters.

Philip V. was now reduced to the brink of ruin. Stanhope, the English general, was the first that gained an advantage over his troops. Stamberg, the German general, defeated them at Saragossa, and Charles entered Madrid in triumph. Still the zeal of the Castilians supported them under all their misfortunes. Lewis was no longer in a condition of supporting them. He, however, sent the duke de Vendôme, a man adored by his soldiers, and who highly merited their love. He no sooner arrived in Spain, than a multitude of volunteers flocked to his standard; and notwithstanding the public calamities, efforts were made to furnish him with money and provisions. He immediately besieged Stanhope in Brihuega, and took him and his garrison prisoners. He gained a decisive battle against Stamberg, at Ville-Viciosa; and in three or four months, restored the affairs of Philip, and put him in possession of a kingdom of which he had hardly the title left. Had Vendôme never been called from the solitude to which he had retired, in all probability, the house of Bourbon would have totally lost the kingdom of Spain. Of such consequence to the affairs of empire is a single leader of genius and talents, when he is revered for his virtues!

Marlborough, though born to be an honour to his country, was a man, and therefore subject to failings. He was too fond of wealth and grandeur, and this gave a handle to his disgrace. He daily lost credit with the queen, because he wanted to act the master rather than the subject. The caprice and intolerable haughtiness of his dutchess occasioned an incurable rupture. The queen had now another favourite, and the tories determined to employ her interest in bringing about a total change in the ministry. Mrs. Masham, the name of the lady, was intimately connected with Mr. Harley, the late secretary of state, who directed her in the manner she was to proceed with the queen, and such springs it was necessary to put in motion, in order to effect the intended purpose. Mrs. Masham was possessed of every requisite to make her the agreeable companion and confederate. The dutchess of Marlborough grew intolerably jealous, and, by her natural impetuosity, widened the wound she should have endeavoured to close. She wrote a very insolent letter to the queen, in which, among other haughty expressions, she said, "Do me justice, and give me no answer." She was, however, soon sensible of her fault, and was very desirous of making reparation; but neither her repentance, her prayers, nor her tears, had power to move a wounded heart she had so long held in slavery. "You desired no answer," said the queen, "and you shall have no answer."

In the mean time, Mrs. Masham neglected neither art nor opportunity to fix herself firmly in the affections of her royal mistress; and succeeded beyond her hopes. In one of their conversations, she artfully gave the subject a political turn, in the course of which she informed her of many things to which she was before wholly a stranger; and when she perceived her curiosity was sufficiently awakened, she referred her, for further satisfaction, to Mr.

Harley.

Harley, of whom the queen had entertained a very high opinion. He was accordingly admitted to several private conferences, and by him the queen was informed of the general discontent which prevailed in every part of the kingdom; at seeing its most essential interests sacrificed to gratify the ambitious views of a private family. He assured her majesty she had nothing to fear from the malignancy of party; that by far the major part of her people were inspired with the genuine principles of loyalty, and entirely devoted to her service; and engaged, if she would remove from about her person the petty tyrants who kept her enslaved, and engage to call a new parliament, such representatives would be sent to the house of commons, as were the truest friends to monarchy, to the established church, and to the protestant succession.

These arguments prevailed: the queen determined to shake off the yoke of the whigs, and supply their places with a tory ministry. Accordingly the earl of Sunderland, secretary of state; the earl of Godolphin, lord-treasurer; the lord chancellor Cowper; the earl of Wharton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland; lord Somers, president of the council; and several other whigs, were displaced, and their employments enjoyed by their rivals. Other changes followed, till at last no whig remained in any place of trust. The parliament, in which the whiggish interest had prevailed, was dissolved, and sure measures were taken for obtaining a parliament of tories.

Though this change was entirely brought about by the interest of Mrs. Masham, yet the trial of Dr. Sacheverel seems first to have rendered the queen uneasy with regard to the principles of the whigs, who, in their speeches on that memorable occasion, had treated monarchical power in such indecent terms, that the queen was alarmed: she found herself, according to their doctrine, reduced to a mere servant of the people. This determined her to examine the matter to the bottom; and the consequence was a total change of the ministry.

Dr. Sacheverel, whose trial had occasioned so much noise, a feeble instrument in himself, but very capable of enflaming the populace, now became one of the principal agents of the court. He was appointed to a living in Wales, and repaired thither in triumph, with a pompous equipage. The university of Oxford treated him as some illustrious personage; and the towns through which he passed expressed their zeal to do him honour. Thousands of the populace ran before him with acclamations. The clergy in general encouraged the enthusiasm of the people, and every place resounded with "The church and Dr. Sacheverel." This happened at the time of the general election; and no incident could have been of more advantage to the tories, of whom this parliament was almost wholly composed.

The new parliament met on the twenty-fifth of November, and on the twenty-seventh was opened by a speech from the throne, in which her majesty recommended the prosecution of the war with vigour, especially in Spain. She declared she was firmly resolved to support the church of England, to preserve the British constitution agreeable to the union, to maintain the indulgence allowed by law to scrupulous consciences, and to employ none but such as were sincerely attached to the protestant succession in the house of Hanover.

Both houses presented very affectionate addresses, and the commons voted the necessary supplies for carrying on the war. They, however, gave sufficient indications that they were determined to humble the whigs, and suffered their writers to abuse the duke of Marlborough in the most outrageous manner. That great general, so often extolled by both houses, so respectable for his actions, the idol of the army, and the terror of France, now suffered the most shameful indignities, as the reward for his services. So uncertain is the favour of princes, and so changeable is the breath of popular fame! The people now insulted the hero they had before almost worshipped. He was accused of pride, avarice, cruelty, violence, extortion, fraud and rapine: even his courage was disputed in the midst of his victories. Never had Rome or Athens known popular clamour more absurd or unjust. The parliament enquired, with the same partiality, into the unsuccessful war in Spain. They censured the conduct of Galway and Stanhope, and loaded Peterborough, their rival, with encomiums. To blacken the former ministry, the house resolved, that those who had supported the bill for a general naturalization, in consequence of which, vast numbers of poor Palatines were brought into England, were enemies to the queen and to the nation.

A. D. 1711. A bill passed, by which it was enacted, that no person should represent a county in parliament, who was not possessed of six hundred pounds a year: the representative of a borough was to be possessed of half that revenue. An attempt was also made to exclude merchants from sitting in the house of commons, where the uncommercial landholder was thought to have a prior right.

Though Harley had so eminently contributed to bring about the late change in the ministry, he soon lost the confidence of the tories, because he was too prudent to join in their violent measures. But a dangerous circumstance soon after restored his reputation. The marquis de Guiscard, a French refugee in the English service, thinking his services not sufficiently rewarded, made offers to the court of France to furnish them with secret intelligence. His letters were intercepted; he was apprehended, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. St. John, secretary of state, and carried before the council for examination. Enraged at this discovery, he desired leave to speak with the secretary, probably with an intention to stab him. His request was refused; and Mr. St. John being at a distance from him, he fell upon Mr. Harley, crying, "Then have at thee," stabbed him in two places in the breast with a pen-knife, and received himself several wounds, of which he died soon after in Newgate. The injurious suspicions that had been entertained of the minister vanished, when an enemy to the state had attempted his life. The two houses of parliament passed the highest encomiums on his loyalty and fidelity. They threw the blame on the papists; and the queen caused the laws that had been enacted against them to be put in execution.

Mr. Harley, on the death of the earl of Rochester, became prime minister, and was created baron of Wigmore, and earl of Oxford and Mortimer. He now established a commercial society, under the title of the South-Sea Company, which was to pay off the navy debts by means of the funds assigned it. The minister imagined, that by the approaching treaty of peace, the company would be permitted to trade to Peru, in the south-sea. He was mistaken; the Spaniards never could be prevailed upon to grant any liberty of that kind.

The new ministry well knew that it would be impossible for them to carry on the war with the same advantage as before, unless Marlborough continued at the head of the army, and acted with his usual alacrity. They were therefore determined to bring about a peace. This measure appeared the more reasonable, as the emperor Joseph being dead, Charles, his brother, was elected to fill the imperial throne; and it was inconsistent with the political system to unite the Austrian power with that of Spain. But the people were so intoxicated with victory, and inflamed with the desire of conquest, that it required no small address to inspire them with pathetic sentiments. It was first necessary to awaken their hatred and contempt for the late ministry, the authors of a war as useless as it was glorious. The commons very readily seconded the views of the court. In a remonstrance to the queen, they said they had discharged the heavy debts of the state; that on enquiring into the causes of these debts, they had discovered frauds and iniquitous employment of the public money : that those who directed the administration during the preceding years, had omitted to give account of more than thirty millions which had passed through their hands ; that their pernicious practice had ruined England ; and that without the intervention of her majesty's prudence, the evil would soon become irremediable. They therefore prayed the queen, that those whom they had accused might be brought to account. This remonstrance produced the desired effect. The late ministry was rendered so odious, that every measure contrary to theirs was approved. It is not uncommon for the people to become dupes to political artifice.

Marlborough, though he had lost his power in the cabinet, was still at the head of the allied army, and appeared again with applause on the theatres of his victories. The lines which marshal Villars had formed to secure his army were thought impenetrable ; he therefore bid defiance to all the efforts of the English general. These lines began at Bouchain on the Scheld, and were continued along the Sanset and the Scharpe to Arras ; and thence along the Upper Scharpe, and the Ugy to the Canche, the openings between these rivers being intrenched and fortified with the utmost art and care. But difficulties only stimulated Marlborough to overcome them. He determined to make himself master of the French lines, and succeeded in a most extraordinary manner. By a feigned march he so artfully diverted the attention of Villars, that he entered the lines near Arleux, almost without opposition, on the fourth of August. This was justly considered as the boldest attempt that had been made during the whole war ; and the honour of it was the greater to the duke of Marlborough, as his army was not only weakened by a large detachment which prince Eugene had carried to the Rhine, but by the calling over five thousand of the best troops in his army for an expedition intended to be undertaken by sea ; so that the troops of the enemy were superior in number to his own. This raised his reputation beyond all he had done formerly ; it was considered as a master-piece of generalship, which had hardly ever been exceeded. Villars, on the contrary, was not only censured for his conduct at Paris, but even ridiculed by his own officers. Marlborough immediately dispatched brigadier Sutton to London with the news that he had made himself master of the French lines, without the loss of a man, though the enemy had boasted they were impenetrable.

Marlborough now determined to besiege Bouchain, contrary to the opinion of the deputies of the states-general, who thought the attempt too difficult. The town was situated in the middle of a morass, strongly fortified, well supplied with provisions and stores, and defended by a numerous garrison. Add to this, that Villars with an army superior in number to that of the allies, was encamped within a mile of the town. The place was invested on the tenth of August by thirty battalions and twelve squadrons, commanded by general Fagel. The siege was pushed with the utmost vigour, and the town soon laid in ruins by the artillery and bombs. Marshal Villars attempted to raise the siege, but in vain. Marlborough had taken his measures so well, that his designs were rendered abortive ; and the place surrendered, on the thirtieth of August. Nor could the garrison obtain any better terms than that of being prisoners of war.

This was the last service the great Marlborough ever performed in the field. The allies were now in possession of the Maese almost to the influx of the Sambre, of the Scheld beyond Tournay, and of the Lys as far as it is navigable. Besides the conquests in Germany, they had also reduced so much of Guelderland, as had formerly been left to Spain by the treaty of Munster ; and likewise Limburg, Brabant, Mechlin in Flanders, two thirds of Hainault with their fortresses, the conquest of which was thought almost impracticable. By the taking of Bouchain, and the progress of the confederate army on the Scharpe and the Lys, they were become masters of two rivers, which, by means of the Deule and its canal, had been serviceable to the French for many years in their continual invasions of the Spanish Netherlands, of which they were wholly deprived. All these important conquests the allies had made during the course of this war, under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough ; who, having given orders for securing the navigation of the Scharpe to Douay, and covering the workmen employed in fortifying several posts on that river and on the Scheld, left the army, and after a short stay at the Hague, landed in England on the seventeenth of November.

A negotiation for a peace with France had been negotiating during the last summer, and the preliminaries offered by that power had been approved of by the English ministry, and the city of Utrecht appointed for holding the conferences. On the seventh of November her majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech from the throne, in which she observed, " That notwithstanding the arts of those who delighted in war, the time and place for a general congress were finally appointed : that her allies, especially the states-general, whose interest she considered as inseparable from her own, had, by their ready concurrence, expressed an entire confidence in her conduct : that her chief concern was, that the protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of the nation should be preserved inviolate, by securing the succession as it was limited by parliament, in the house of Hanover : that she should use all her endeavours, in the ensuing negotiation, to obtain all the advantages of trade and commerce, which a tender and affectionate sovereign could procure for a dutiful and loyal people : that with regard to the princes and states who were engaged in the war, she would leave no means unattempted to obtain for each of them all reasonable satisfaction : that as the best way to forward the treaty would be to make early provision for opening the campaign, she hoped they would grant the necessary supplies for the ensuing year, and begged they would proceed in this affair with such dispatch, as might convince the enemy, that if she could not obtain a good peace, she was ready to prosecute the war with vigour."

Satisfied that while Marlborough continued at the head of the army, the strongest opposition would be made to the offers of peace, the ministry determined to strip him of all his posts. The committee for examining the public accounts, having proved that he had received annually a considerable sum from the victuallers of the army, the queen declared in council, that in order to enquire impartially into that affair, she thought it necessary to remove him from all his employments. This declaration was the next day imparted to him in a letter wrote by the queen's own hand, in which she took occasion to complain of the treatment she had received from him and his friends. It was now sufficiently evident what reliance is to be placed on the favour of the people, when the object, however deserving, is no longer in power. That great general, whom they had so lately in a manner deified and adored, and whose glorious actions filled every mouth with praises, was now become the object of the most indecent satire, and the most bitter invectives. He who had so lately possessed the favour and confidence of almost every power in Europe, now found himself unable to oppose the envenomed shafts of destructive party.

But notwithstanding the ministry had found means to destroy the power of Marlborough, they perceived that it would be impossible to procure the approbation of the house of lords to the intended peace, unless some method could be found to turn the majority in favour of the court, it being now sufficiently evident that it was in favour of the other party. Accordingly the queen was persuaded to create no less than twelve new peers; a number which the ministry imagined would secure them the majority in the upper house.
less

A.D. 1712. While these measures were in agitation, prince Eugene arrived in England, and was introduced by Mr. secretary St. John to a private audience of her majesty. After a short compliment, which her majesty very graciously returned, he delivered to her a letter from the emperor, which he desired her majesty to peruse, as it contained the whole purport of his visit to her court. After reading the letter, the queen was pleased to tell the prince, "that she was extremely sorry the state of her health did not permit her to speak so often as she could wish with his highness; but that she had ordered her secretary and treasurer to receive his proposals, and confer with his highness as frequently as he should think proper."

Eugene still treated Marlborough with the same respect as if he had been still in favour. Oxford inviting him one day to dinner, congratulated himself with being honoured with the presence of the greatest general in Europe. "If I am the greatest general," answered the prince, "it is to you I am indebted for the favour." This spirited compliment was undoubtedly due to Marlborough, whom Oxford's ministry had disgraced.

Mr. secretary St. John immediately acquainted the commons, that he had received her majesty's commands to lay before the house a proposition made her by prince Eugene, in the name of the emperor, for supporting the war in Spain. The substance of it was, "That his imperial majesty judges that forty thousand men will be sufficient for this service; and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to about four millions of crowns, towards which his imperial majesty offers to make up the troops he has already in that kingdom, to thirty thousand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himself."

This proposal was received with great coldness in the house of commons; so that though Eugene was received with all the honours due to his birth and merit, he saw no prospect of succeeding. He therefore hastened back to the continent, to take upon himself the command of the army, in which he had now no competitor for glory. In the mean time, the trial of Marlborough was deferred, but notwithstanding all the regard and friendship Eugene shewed for that great leader, the commons kept no measures with the duke. They accused him of malversation; and it is certain that too great a thirst of wealth had sullied the glory of that illustrious general. But that glory, and his eminent services, were surely sufficient to have thrown a veil over a few failings, especially as he had it in his power to justify his conduct by orders from the ministry. He was, however, unwilling to enflame the nation, and prudently sought refuge in foreign countries, to elude a prosecution carried on by a party who could not bear to see him any longer in power, or even enjoy, unmolested, the rewards of his victories.

During this session of parliament, some bills were passed, which must not be passed over in silence. The duke of Hamilton, a Scottish peer, demanded his seat in the house of lords, in quality of duke of Brandon. The question was, whether Scottish peers, created peers of England since the union, had a right to a seat in parliament. Though there had been already a precedent favourable to the duke, the question was carried in the negative by five voices. All the peers that voted for the question protested against the decision, and the Scotch lords complained with the greatest acrimony. The bill for occasional conformity, so long opposed by the whigs, and desired by the church of England, passed into a law, but in a more moderate form than that in which it had been before proposed. The naturalization bill, which had occasioned such prodigious numbers of poor protestant foreigners to settle in England, was annulled; it having been found, that the idle and the indigent were as great a burden to the state as the industrious were a benefit. A bill also passed in favour of the episcopalians, who were always precluded from toleration in Scotland. This was a dreadful mortification to the presbyterians; and their resentment was raised to the highest pitch, when an order was published for shutting the courts of judicature during the Christmas holidays, which they considered as a relic of popery. "As the house will make no alteration in the bill," said one of the members, "I submit; but desire it may be intitled, A bill to establish jacobitism and licentiousness of manners."

The Dutch having shewn evident signs of displeasure at the peace now in agitation, the commons, in revenge, attacked the treaty concluded some years before with the states, by which the barrier was granted to them in the Low Countries. They represented to the queen, in a studied remonstrance, "that Holland had not furnished her contingent of troops, and that England had been overcharged nineteen millions during the war. The states general published a memorial in vindication of their conduct, and the commons voted it a scandalous libel, injurious to the house, and tending to alienate the minds of the people from the present government. Such untoward incidents formed the prelude to the approaching peace!"

But notwithstanding these alarming appearances, the conferences were opened at Utrecht with all the appearance of success. The emperor and the states general continued obstinate to their proposals, and were for reducing Lewis XIV. to the most humiliating concessions. The British ministry therefore found it absolutely necessary to carry on the treaty without them, or break off the negotiation. The French now delivered their specific explanation of the offers for a general peace. These were transmitted to London, and, as far as they related to Great-Britain, were as follow:

"The French king will acknowledge, at the signing of the peace, the queen of Great-Britain in that quality; as also the succession of that crown according to the present settlement; and in the manner her Britannic majesty shall please.

"His majesty will cause all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demolished immediately after the peace, provided an equivalent be given him to his satisfaction.

The island of St. Christopher's, Hudson's Bay, and freight of that name, shall be yielded up entire to the crown of Great-Britain; and Acadia, with Port Royal and the Fort, shall be restored entire to her majesty.

As to the island of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that also to Great-Britain, reserving only to himself the port of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fish, as before the war.

"It shall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce, before or after the peace, as England shall chuse; the conditions of which shall be made as equal as possible between the two nations."

These offers were treated as trifling, arrogant, and injurious to her majesty and her allies, by several members in the house of peers. Some endeavours were made to adjourn the debates, but in vain; and it was resolved, without a division, to address the queen, representing the just indignation the house entertained at the insolence of France, in having proposed to acknowledge her majesty's title to these realms no sooner than when the peace should be signed; as also at the terms of peace offered to her and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France, declaring, at the same time, that they would assist her majesty to the utmost of their power in prosecuting the war, until they should obtain a safe and honourable peace.

The duke of Ormond having been appointed commander in chief of the English forces, in the room of the duke of Marlborough, passed over to the continent in the beginning of April, and on the twentieth of May, his grace, in concert with prince Eugene, assembled the army between Douay and Marchiennes, where it was found, upon a review, that the allied army consisted of one hundred and twenty-two thousand, two hundred and fifty men. Prince Eugene soon after proposed to attack the French army under marshal Villars, or to invest the town of Quesnoy; but Ormond, who had now received fresh orders from Mr. secretary St. John, gave the prince and deputies of the states-general to understand, that her Britannic majesty, having a prospect that the negotiations for a peace would prove successful, had commanded him not to act offensively against the enemy.

Alarmed at this unexpected refusal, the states-general not only complained to the British ministers at the congress, but also sent over a letter to the queen, ordering their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand. It contained an excuse for the backwardness they had shewn in acting in concert with her majesty. They said, "That all the difference between the queen and them, was a disparity of sentiments; and if for such a cause, confederates united by the strongest ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come. The Dutch envoy also received orders to publish copies of this letter in the public papers. This was accordingly done, and they were printed and dispersed at the very time when the letter came to the queen's hand.

Inceded at these proceedings, which were considered as a remonstrance rather than a representation, and an appeal to the people than an address to the sovereign, the queen wrote a very sharp letter to the states. At the same time, the commons voted an address to her majesty, wherein they assured her, "of the just sense the house had of the indignity offered to her majesty, by printing and publishing a letter from the states-general; and humbly desired, that she would so far resent such indignities, as to give no answers for the future to any letters or memorials that should be so printed and published."

Lewis had lost the dauphin, his only son, the duke of Burgundy his grandson, the eldest of the duke of Burgundy's children; and the duke of Anjou, now on the Spanish throne, was threatened with approaching death. From these misfortunes there was great reason to fear that the crowns of France and Spain would be soon united. The conclusion of the treaty, the secret articles whereof were regulated by the two courts of France and England, depended upon this renunciation. Experience had, indeed, taught, that very little reliance could be placed on such renunciations; but it was hoped, that in case of necessity, this would be insisted on by all the powers interested in preserving the balance of Europe. Philip V. yielded to necessity; and the queen agreed to a suspension of arms. Orders were immediately sent to the duke of Ormond to put an end to hostilities. The queen laid the plan of the treaty before the parliament; and notwithstanding all the efforts of the whig party, the two houses presented addresses to her majesty, wherein they declared at once their gratitude and approbation.

When the duke of Ormond abandoned the allies, Eugene was employed in the siege of Quesnoy. Almost all the foreign troops in English pay refused to follow him; so strong were their ideas of new triumphs, and of humbling the enemy in the dust. Lewis agreed to give up Dunkirk as a pledge to the English for his engagements, and waited with impatience the events of a critical campaign. Eugene took Quesnoy, and besieged Landreci; while detachments from his army ravaged the country, and the kingdom of France was thrown into the utmost confusion. But the lines of Eugene were too much extended. Villars forced the entrenchments of general Albemarle, who was encamped at Denain, and the prince was unable to give him any assistance. He took Marchiennes, where the magazines of the allies were formed; raised the siege of Landreci, retook Douay, Quesnoy, and Bouchain; and in one campaign became superior to the conqueror; so long flushed with victory.

A.D. 1713. The allies began now to perceive that all their efforts, without the assistance of England, would be in vain: they therefore came into the measures of England, and the famous treaty of Utrecht was signed on the first of April. By this treaty, the French king acknowledged the protestant succession of the house of Hanover to the crown of Great-Britain; and engaged for himself, his heirs and successors, not to suffer the pretender to return into France, nor any way to succour or assist him.

"That the crowns of France and Spain should never be united under one head; that renunciations should be made by both sides in due form; and that they should never be united under any pretence whatsoever.

"That the trade between France and Spain shall be on the same footing as in the time of Charles II.

"That the fortifications of Dunkirk should be demolished, and the harbour filled up, never to be repaired. That the bay and freights of Hudson should be restored, and satisfaction be made to the company for the damages they had sustained.

"That the whole island of St. Christopher should be hereafter possessed by the English, and also Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

"That the island of Newfoundland should belong wholly to Great-Britain; the French having only huts for drying their fish, and liberty to fish only from Cape Bona Vista to the northern point of that island, and so down the western side as far as port Roche. But the French were to retain Cape Breton, and other islands in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence.

"That the French in Canada should not molest the five nations of Indians subject to Great-Britain; nor the subjects of Great-Britain molest the Indians under the protection of France.

"That all letters of marque, counter-marque and reprisal, be annulled.

"That justice shall be done to the Hamilton family with regard to the dutchy of Chatelault; to the duke of Richmond, concerning such requests as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, with regard to certain lands to be reclaimed by him."

The treaty having been laid before the parliament, and approved of, the queen came to the house of peers on the sixteenth of July, and put an end to the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I come now to put an end to this session with great satisfaction, and return you all my hearty thanks for the good service you have done to the public.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I must particularly thank you for the supplies you have now given: I will take care to apply them, as far as they will reach, to satisfy the services you have voted.

"I hope, at the next meeting, the affair of commerce will be so well understood, that the advantageous conditions I have obtained from France will be made effectual for the benefit of our trade.

"I cannot part with so good and loyal a house of commons, without expressing how sensible I am of the affection, zeal, and duty, with which you have behaved yourselves; and I think myself therefore obliged to take notice of those remarkable services you have performed.

"At your first meeting, you formed a method, without farther charge to my people, to ease them of the heavy load of more than nine millions; and the way of doing it may bring great advantage to the nation.

" In this session you have enabled me to be just in paying the debts of my servants.

" And as you furnished supplies for carrying on the war, so you have strengthened my hands, by obtaining a peace.

" Thus you have shewed yourselves the true representatives of my loyal commons, by the just regard you have paid to the good of your country, and my honour. These proceedings will, I doubt not, preserve the memory of this parliament to posterity.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" At my coming to the crown, I found a war prepared for me. God hath blessed my arms with many victories, and at last has enabled me to make them useful by a safe and honourable peace.

" I heartily thank you for the assistance you have given me therein, and I promise myself, that, with your concurrence, it will be lasting.

" To this end I recommend it to you all, to make my subjects truly sensible what they gain by the peace; and that you will endeavour to dissipate those groundless jealousies, which have been so industriously fomented among us, that our unhappy divisions may not weaken, and, in some sort, endanger, the advantages I have obtained for my kingdoms.

" There are some (very few I hope) who will never be satisfied with any government: it is necessary, therefore, that you shew your love to your country, by exerting yourselves, to obviate the malice of the ill-minded, and to undeceive the deluded.

" Nothing can establish peace at home, nothing can remove the disorders that have happened during so long a war, but a steady adhering to the constitution in church and state.

" Such as are true to these principles, are only to be relied on; and as they have the best title to my favour, so you may depend upon my having no interest or aim but your advantage, and the securing of our religion and liberty.

" I hope, for the quiet of these nations, and the universal good, that I shall next winter meet my parliament, resolved to act upon the same principles, with the same prudence, and with such vigour, as may enable me to support the liberties of Europe abroad, and reduce the spirit of faction at home."

Few speeches ever delivered from the throne have been more reflected upon than this. It seemed strange, that the queen, who did not pretend to understand trade, should pass such a censure upon both houses, for not being wiser in that particular than herself, especially as it appeared, from the information given at the bar of both houses, and the debates which ensued upon it, that the treaty, with regard to commerce, was so opposite to the interest of England, that it seemed to be a contempt on their understanding to represent it as advantageous, and to rank all those who opposed it among the ill-minded, or at least among the deluded. Nor did her asserting the nation to be eased of nine millions, without any farther charge, escape censure; because it was well known the nation must support the constant burden of interest at six per cent. till the capital was paid off.

The emperor Charles VI. refused to enter into the negotiations, but had soon cause to repent of his obstinacy. Marshal Villars, having nothing to fear in Flanders, marched towards the Rhine, took Landau and Friburgh, and defeated a considerable body of German troops. Charles then desired peace, and at last obtained it by the treaty of Rastadt, but on less advantageous conditions than he might have acquired, had he joined the allies in their negotiations at Utrecht. He might then have had Landau, and, possibly, Strassburg; but he knew not when to cease hostilities in the most profitable manner.

A. D. 1714. In the beginning of the year, the ratifications of the treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Spain were brought over to England, and peace was proclaimed on the first of March. The following are the chief articles in this treaty:

That the crowns of France and Spain should never be united: that the protestant succession should be acknowledged, and never be opposed on any pretence: that navigation and commerce should be on the same footing as in the treaty of 1667: that no licence should be given to the French, or other nations, to introduce negroes, or any merchandises, into the Spanish dominions in America, except what might be agreed on by the treaty of commerce, and the privilege granted by the assiento of negroes, except also what should be granted by the catholic king, after the assiento should be determined: that the American dominions should not be alienated from the crown of Spain, to France, or any other nation: that Gibraltar and the island of Minorca should be given up to England for ever: that no Moors were to come thither but on account of traffick: that all the Spanish inhabitants should enjoy their estates and religion, or have liberty to sell their estates, and retire: that the South-sea company should have the privilege of introducing negroes into several parts of America for thirty years, commencing with the year 1713, in the same manner as enjoyed by the French: that the Catalans should have a full and free pardon, with the possession of all their estates, and honours, and enjoy the same privileges with the inhabitants of both Castiles: that Sicily should be yielded to the duke of Savoy; but in case of his dying without heirs, the kingdom should return to Spain. By two separate articles, the queen promised to persist in the measures, by which she had taken care, that no other part of the Spanish monarchy should be torn from it; and obliged herself to procure the prince of Ursini to be put into possession of Limburg, or some other country in the Netherlands, which should produce thirty thousand crowns a year, pursuant to a grant made her by king Philip in the year 1713. The parliament had been opened by commission some time before this peace was published; but the day after, her majesty repaired to the house of peers, and delivered the following speech:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I have much satisfaction, in being able, at the opening of this parliament, to tell you, that the ratifications of the treaties of peace and of commerce with Spain are exchanged, by which my subjects will have greater opportunities than ever to improve and extend their trade. Many advantages formerly enjoyed by connivance, and procured by such methods as made a distinction between one British merchant and another, are now settled by treaty, and an equal rule is established.

" It hath pleased God to bless my endeavours to obtain an honourable and advantageous peace for my own people, and for the greatest part of my allies. Nothing that I can do shall be wanting to render it universal; and I persuade myself, that, with your hearty concurrence, my interposition may at last prove effectual to complete the settlements of Europe.

" In the mean while, I congratulate with my own subjects, that they are delivered from a consuming land war, and entered on a peace, the good effect whereof nothing but intestine divisions can obstruct.

" It was the glory of the wisest and greatest of my predecessors to hold the balance of Europe, and to keep it equal by casting in their weight as necessity required. By this conduct, they enriched the kingdom, and rendered themselves dreadful to their enemies, and useful to their friends. I have proceeded on the same principles, and I doubt not but my successors will follow these examples.

" Our situation points out to us our true interest; for this country can flourish only by trade, and will be most formidable, by a right application of our naval force.

" Gentlemen of the house of commons, I now

" I have ordered such accounts to be prepared and laid before you, as will shew you, at the conclusion clusion of the war, the true state of your condition; whereby you will be better able to judge what aids are necessary; and I only ask of you supplies for the current service of the year, and for the discharge of such debts as you shall find, on examination, to be just and reasonable.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The joy which has been generally expressed on my recovery from my late indisposition, and on my coming to this city, I esteem as a return for that tender affection which I have always had for my people.

"I wish that effectual care had been taken, as I have often desired, to suppress those seditious papers and factious rumours, by which designing men have been able to sink credit, and the innocent have suffered.

"There are some who have arrived to that height of malice, as to insinuate, that the protestant succession in the house of Hanover is in danger under my government.

"Those who go about thus to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, can only mean to disturb the present tranquillity, and bring real mischief upon us.

"After all I have done to secure our religion and your liberties, and to transmit both safe to posterity, I cannot mention these proceedings without some degree of warmth; and I must hope you will all agree with me, that attempts to weaken my authority, or to render the possession of the crown uneasy to me, can never be proper means to strengthen the protestant succession.

"I have done, and shall continue to do my best for the good of all my subjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it shall be mine, to unite our differences, not by relaxing from the strictest adherence to our constitution in church and state, but by observing the laws yourselves, and enforcing a due obedience to them in others.

"A long war has not only impoverished the public, (however some particular men may have been gainers by it) but has also greatly affected government itself.

"Let it be your care so to improve the present opportunity, as to lay the foundation of recovering from those disorders.

"I had the concurrence of the last parliament in making the peace. Let it be the honour of this to assist me in obtaining such fruits from it as may not only derive blessings on the present age, but even down to the latest posterity."

This speech produced some debates in both houses; but addresses of thanks were voted both by the lords and commons; and the queen, after thanking the lords for their affectionate address, added, "That they who were nearest the throne would first of her subjects feel the evil consequences of any diminution of the regal authority; that it was a comfort to her she had the assurance of their support; and they might depend upon it, she would never give way to the least attempt on the just authorities of the crown, or any of their rights and privileges."

The next day the convocation complimented the queen in a joint address "on her recovery and happy return to her royal city in health and safety," concluding with their wishes, "That after a long and happy reign, she might be able to transmit the protection of the church and state to a protestant successor in the illustrious house of Hanover, which her majesty, to the great satisfaction and comfort of all her faithful and good subjects, had so often declared to be at her royal heart."

The lords taking the state of these kingdoms into consideration, the leaders of the whigs represented the danger that threatened the protestant succession, on account of the pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of peace, and moved, that addresses be presented to the queen,

"First for an account of what steps had been taken for removing the pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, and what answers had been given by that duke. Secondly, an account of the negotiations of peace: what measures had been taken to render the peace universal: and what obstructions her majesty had met with. Thirdly, an account of what instances had been made for restoring the Catalans their ancient privileges, and all letters relating to that negotiation. Fourthly, an account of the monies granted since the year 1710, for carrying on the war in Spain and Portugal." These addresses were presented without opposition. But the ministry, perceiving that the whigs were forming several other motions which could not fail of greatly embarrassing their measures, the lord-treasurer moved to adjourn the house till the thirty-first of March, which was carried by a small majority.

Though the ministry had increased their party during the recess of parliament, yet the debates were carried on with as much zeal as ever in the house of lords; and the papers addressed for being laid before the house, the whigs represented, "That the crown of Great-Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the house of Austria, and engaged to support them, those engagements ought to be made good." To this lord Bolingbroke answered, "that the queen had used all her endeavours to procure to the Catalans the enjoyment of their ancient liberties and privileges; but that after all, the engagements she had entered into, subsisted no longer than while Charles was in Spain; but that prince being advanced to the imperial dignity, and having himself abandoned the Catalans, she could do no more, than interpose her good offices in their behalf, which she had not been wanting to do." To this it was replied, "That God had put more effectual means into her majesty's hands."

After some other speeches, earl Cowper moved for an address to the queen, importing, "That her endeavours for preserving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of their ancient liberties, being proved ineffectual, their lordships made it their humble request, that she would continue her interpositions in the most pressing manner in their behalf." The ministry perceiving that it would be in vain to oppose the motions of the whigs, the address was agreed to.

Still no satisfactory account was given with regard to the present residence of the pretender, who was said still to continue in Lorrain. The earl of Sunderland said, "that notwithstanding the earnest application made last session by both houses to her majesty, to use her utmost endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was assured by baron Fostner, the duke of Lorrain's minister, some weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no instances had yet been made to his master for that purpose." To this lord Bolingbroke answered, "He wondered baron Fostner could make such a declaration, since he himself had made those declarations to him in the queen's name." But lord Halifax confirmed what the earl of Sunderland had advanced by saying, "That baron Fostner had told him as much but four days before; so that lord Bolingbroke must be mistaken, at least in point of chronology."

This debate brought on a motion of more consequence; the question was "whether the protestant succession be in danger under the present administration? This question gave rise to a very warm debate, which continued for near seven hours, during which time many warm speeches were made against the ministry. That of the earl of Anglesea was remarkable. He said, among other things, "That when he came into the house, he thought indeed the protestant succession to be still in danger on the part of France, whose interest it was to restore the pretender: But that after he had heard what so many noble members of that august assembly, persons of undoubted undoubted honour and probity, had alledged against the ministers, and no answer offered to confute it, either by the ministers themselves or their friends, he could not but believe the succession to be in danger." He afterwards endeavoured to clear himself with regard to the share he had in some late transactions. "I own," said he, "I gave my assent to the cessation of arms, for which I take shame to myself, and ask God, my country, and my conscience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit, till that noble lord (turning towards the lord treasurer) had assured the council, that the peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her majesty and her allies." Adding, "That as the honour of his country, and the good of his sovereign, formed the rule of his actions, so he had no respect of persons; and if he found himself imposed upon, he durst pursue an evil minister from the queen's closet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the scaffold." The lord-treasurer, against whom the latter part of his speech was levelled, said, "That the peace was as glorious and advantageous as could be expected, considering the necessity of affairs, and the opposition the queen's ministers had met with, both at home and abroad." Several lords replied, that no ministers ever had it in their power to make so honourable and advantageous a peace as the queen's ministers had. The duke of Argyle added, "That he had lately crossed the kingdom of France, both in going to and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the finest countries in the universe, but that there were marks of a general desolation in all the places through which he passed. That he had rid forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: that the rest of the people were in the utmost misery and distress; and therefore he could not apprehend what necessity there was to conclude a peace so precipitately with a prince whose dominions were so greatly exhausted of men, of money, and of provisions." With regard to the question in debate he said, "That he firmly believed the succession of the illustrious house of Hanover to be in danger from the present ministers, whom he durst charge with mal-administration both within doors and without: that he knew, and offered to prove, that the lord-treasurer had yearly remitted four thousand pounds to the highland clans in Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the pretender, in order to keep them under discipline, and ready for any attempt: that, on the other hand, the new-modelling of the army, by disbanding some regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vast number of officers merely on account of their known affection for the house of Hanover, were clear indications of the designs in hand: that it was a disgrace to the nation to see men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the posts of several brave officers, who, after they had often expoled their lives for their country, were now starving in prison for want of their pay." The lord-treasurer now rose, and laying his hand upon his breast, said, "I have, on so many occasions, given such signal proofs of my affection to the protestant succession, that I am sure no member of that august assembly could call it in question. At the same time I own I have remitted to Scotland, for two or three years past, three thousand eight hundred pounds to the highland clans; but I hope the house will give me an opportunity of clearing my conduct with regard to that point. As for the reformed officers, I have given orders they shall be paid directly."

After several other speeches the question was put and carried in the negative by twelve voices only. But though the protestant religion was thus voted not to be in danger, lord Halifax, in order to put their professions of affection for the house of Hanover to the test, moved, "That an address be presented to the queen, that she would renew her instances for the speedy removing the pretender out of Lorrain; and that she would, in conjunction with the states-general, enter into the guaranty of the protestant succession in the house of Hanover, and also with such other princes as she should think proper." He was seconded by the earl of Wharton, who moved likewise, that in the address, "Her majesty might be desired to issue a proclamation, promising a reward to any person who should bring the pretender dead or alive:" this motion was seconded by the duke of Bolton, who also moved, that the reward might be suitable to the importance of that service. Nothing was said in opposition to the motions: but it being late, some members expressed their desire that the house should adjourn. But the other side calling for the question, it was unanimously resolved that the address should be presented.

When the address against the pretender was reported by the committee appointed to draw it up, the lord North and Grey made a long speech, "Wherein he endeavoured to shew the barbarity of setting a reward upon any man's head; which, he said, was nothing less than giving encouragement to murder and assassination; and how repugnant such a practice was to the laws of christianity, the law of nature, and the laws of all civilized nations." He represented in particular, "How inconsistent such a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of so august an assembly in a nation and government famed for lenity and clemency." He concluded with saying, "No man either had more respect for the illustrious house of Hanover, or would do more to secure them than himself; but that they must excuse him, if he would not incur perdition for them." He was supported by lord Trevor, who said, "What that noble peer had spoke was sufficient to shew, how inconsistent such a proceeding was with christianity, and the civil law; and therefore he would confine himself to the laws of England; and, if he knew, or understood any thing of these, he was confident they were no less opposite to such proceedings than the civil law. He knew he did not speak there as a lawyer or judge, but as a peer: but he was so fully satisfied of our law discountenancing all such proceedings, that if ever such a case should come before him as a judge, he should think himself bound in justice, honour, and conscience, to condemn such an action as murder; and therefore he hoped the supreme court of judicature in England, and the most august tribunal in the universe, would not make a precedent for encouraging assassination;" and therefore he moved, "that the reward should be for apprehending and bringing the pretender to justice, in case he should land, or attempt to land, either in Great Britain or Ireland: and that her majesty should issue her royal proclamation, whenever in her great wisdom she should judge it necessary." To this it was answered, "That however contrary such a proceeding might be to the precepts of christianity, it was warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the most civilized nations in Europe, and of our own nation in particular. For without recurring to remoter instances, we have the example of king James II. who set a price on the head of his own nephew, the duke of Monmouth." But these reasonings were not well supported, and the motion was agreed to by a majority of ten voices. When the address was presented to the queen, she returned the following answer:

"My lords,

"It would be a real strengthening to the succession of the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end were put to these groundless fears and jealousies, which have been so industriously promoted.

"I do not, at this time, see any occasion for such a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be necessary, I shall give my orders for having one issued.

"As for the other particulars in this address, I will give proper directions therein."

This answer revived the hopes of the pretender's friends, who, before the late warm speeches were made against him in the upper house, were so elated, that an agent from King James' queen, had attempted to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded, in her name, the sum of six hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year, since the death of James II. But the agent having in the bill given her the title of queen-mother, the officer refused to file it; upon which the agent changed the title, and presented it in the name of "the most illustrious princess Maria, relict of James II. king of England." Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, pursuant to a formal agreement made in France by lord Bolingbroke, about fifty thousand pounds were remitted thither for her use.

The very day the address was presented an incident happened, which threw the ministry into the utmost confusion. Most of the whig lords had held a consultation at the house of lord Halifax, to which baron Scütz, envoy from the elector of Hanover was admitted. In this meeting it was resolved, that the baron should take the first opportunity of demanding a writ for the electoral prince to sit in the house of peers, as duke of Cambridge. Accordingly Scütz made a visit to the chancellor, and among other civilities acknowledged the affection he had shewn on several occasions to the house of Hanover. The chancellor told him, "he was extremely sensible of the honour he did him by his visit and compliment; and desired him to assure the elector of his entire devotion to his service; hoping his highness gave no credit to the false reports that were industriously spread, in order to give him jealousies of her majesty's ministers." The baron answered that he would not fail to discharge so agreeable a commission; but he had a favour to ask of him, in the name of the electoral prince, that his lordship would be pleased to make out a writ for his sitting in the house of peers as duke of Cambridge. Surprized at this unexpected demand, the chancellor told the baron, "That though it was unusual to make out writs for peers who were not in the kingdom, yet he would immediately apply to her majesty for directions." The baron answered, "he did not doubt his lordship's performing the duties of his office. But, with regard to the objection of the duke's being out of the kingdom, he could assure him his electoral highness proposed coming over very speedily, and might perhaps be landed before the writ was made out." The baron now took his leave, and the chancellor desired him to remember, "That he did not refuse his demand, but thought proper to acquaint the queen of it, which he would do immediately." A council was directly held in the queen's presence, and after very long debates it was resolved, that the chancellor should make out a writ for the duke of Cambridge. The queen was, however, so highly offended at the baron's making his application to the chancellor, before he had informed her of his intentions, that he forbade him the court.

But though the writ was ordered to be made out for the duke of Cambridge, the ministry was determined he should not visit England; and a report prevailing that the princess Sophia intended to desire the queen's approbation for the duke of Cambridge's coming into England, her majesty, with the advice of her cabinet council wrote that princess the following letter:

"Madam, Sister, Aunt.

"Since the right of succession to my kingdom has been declared to belong to you and your family, there have always been disaffected persons, who, by particular views of their own interest, have entered into measures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even while I am living. I never thought till now, that this project would have gone so far, as to have made the least impression on your mind. But, as I lately perceived, by public rumours, which are industriously spread, that your electoral highness is come into this sentiment, it is of importance, with respect to the succession of your family, that I should call you such a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it some consequences, that will be dangerous to that succession itself, which is not secure any other way, than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her prerogative. There are here (such are our misfortunes) a great many people, that are seditiously disposed. So I leave you to judge what tumults they may be able to raise, if they should have a pretext to begin a commotion. I persuade myself, therefore, you will never consent, that the least thing should be done, that may disturb the repose of me and my subjects.

"Open yourself to me with the same freedom I do to you, and propose whatever you think may contribute to the security of the succession, I will come into it with zeal, provided it do not derogate from my dignity which I am resolved to maintain. I am with a great deal of affection, &c.

At the same time her majesty wrote the following letter to the duke of Cambridge:

"Cousin,

"An accident which has happened in my lord Packer's family, having hindered him from setting forward so soon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with respect to the design you have formed of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of this matter ought to have been first to me; so I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendship I have for you, and the electoral house to which you belong; and the true desire I have, that it may succeed to my kingdom: and this requires of me that I should tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my dominions, and the right of succession in your line, and consequently more disagreeable to me, than such a proceeding at this juncture.

"I am, &c."

These letters greatly affected the princess Sophia, who was now in the eighty-fourth year of her age, that the very day after she had received them, she was seized with an apoplectic fit as she was walking in the gardens of Herenhäusen, and died in the arms of the electoral princess, before physicians could come to her assistance. She was the fourth and youngest daughter of Frederick, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth of England only daughter of James I. This princess was of a strong and healthy constitution, and a perfect mistress of most of the modern languages; her genius was equally turned for conversation or business, and hence she became at once the ornament and delight of her court. Her turns of wit were sprightly and surprising; her judgment solid and penetrating. Nothing could exceed the beauties and advantages of her conversation, but her letters; both were easy, entertaining and useful. She enjoyed a fund of happiness within herself, which gave a relish to her retirements: but her care in government and economy shewed the just sense she entertained of being born for the good of others. Her piety was exemplary without affectation; and her sentiments of religion just and noble. She lived beloved, and her hearse was bedewed with the tears of the good and the virtuous.

Bolingbroke and the other leaders of the tory party, determined, if possible, to defeat the protestant succession, brought in the famous schism bill, it being thought necessary for accomplishing their scheme, to ruin the dissenters. It was presented to the house of commons by Sir William Windham, and strenuously opposed by the whole power of the whig party; but passed the house by a considerable majority.

When it was read the first time in the house of peers, lord Bolingbroke said, "It was a bill of the last importance, since it concerned the security of the church of England, the best and firmest support of the church and monarchy; both which all good men, and particularly that august assembly, who derive their lustre from and are near the throne, ought to have have most at heart, and therefore he moved that, it should be read a second time." Lord Cowper replied, "That no man was more ready than himself to do every thing that should appear necessary to attain the seeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of schism, and the farther securing the church of England. But that the enacting part would be so far from answering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to church and state. That instead of preventing schism, and enlarging the pale of the church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inseparable attendants, superstition and irreligion. That in many country towns, reading, writing and grammar schools were chiefly supported by the dissenters; not only for the instruction and benefit of their own children, but likewise of those poor churchmen; so that the suppressing those schools, would, in some places, suppress the reading of the Holy Scriptures." On the other hand he observed, "that this bill struck at the ancient rights and prerogative of the house of peers; which, by the constitution, is the supreme court of judicature, and the dernier resort in all causes; whereas, by this bill, the justices of the peace were empowered to hear and finally determine the offences against the same. I would, my lords, added he, rather enlarge than abridge the power of justices of the peace, were it only to encourage gentlemen to take upon them an office so troublesome, and so unprofitable, unless it be, perhaps, in the county of Middlesex. But, at the same time, my lords, I shall never consent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this august assembly, of which I have the honour to be a member."

The earl of Wharton attacked the supporters of the bill with the most poignant irony. "I am," said he, "agreeably surprized to see some men of pleasure become on a sudden so religious; as to set up for patrons of the church." But I am astonished that persons who have been educated in dissenting academies, whom I could point out, and whose tutors I could name, should appear the most forward in oppressing them. This is surely but an indifferent return for the benefit the public has received from those schools; which have bred those great men, who have made so glorious a peace, and treaties that have executed themselves. I can therefore see no reason for suppressing these academies, unless it be from an apprehension, that they may still produce greater geniuses, that may drown the merits and abilities of these great men. To be serious, my lords, it is no less melancholy than surprizing, that at a time when the court of France prosecutes the design they have long since formed to extirpate our holy religion; when not only secret practices are used to impose a popish pretender on these realms, but men are publicly enlisted for his service: it is, I say, melancholy and surprizing, that at this very time a bill should be brought in, which must tend to divide the protestants; and consequently to weaken their interest, and hasten their ruin. But the wonder will cease when we consider, that madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill." He declaimed particularly against the word schism, with which the frontispiece of the bill was decorated, and said, "It is something strange that they should call schism in England, what is the established religion in Scotland; and therefore, if the lords who represented the nobility of that part of Great Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that in order to be even with us, and consistent with themselves, they would move for bringing in another bill to promote the growth of schism in their own country." He added, "That both in the bill itself, and also in the speeches of those who had declared for it, several laws were recited and alledged, but there was a law which had not yet been mentioned, it is the law of the gospel, To do unto others as we would be done unto."

Several other very remarkable speeches were made on this remarkable bill, and several amendments were made to it, which rendered it very different from what it appeared in its original state. With these amendments it was carried in the house of peers by a majority of five voices, and afterwards received the royal assent.

The house seemed now determined to censure the conduct of lord Bolingbroke; but the queen in order to prevent the consequences, that might ensue, came to the house of Lords on the ninth of July, and put an end to the session with the following speech, from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"The progress which has been made in public business, and the season of the year, render it both convenient and necessary, that I should put an end to this session.

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"I return you my hearty thanks for all your good services to me and to your country, and particularly for the supplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year, as towards the discharging of the national debt. In our present circumstances it could not be expected, that a full provision should be made on both these heads. What you have granted shall be laid out with the best husbandry, and to the greatest advantage.

"My Lords and Gentlemen;

"I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in such a temper as is necessary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is to preserve to you, and to your posterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my subjects; and to procure the present and future tranquillity of my kingdom. But I must tell you plainly, that these desirable ends can never be attained, unless you bring the same dispositions on your parts; unless all groundless jealousies, which create and foment divisions among you be laid aside; and unless you shew the same regard for my prerogative, and for the honour of my government, as I have always expressed for the rights of my people."

This was the last speech the queen ever made to her parliament: her constitution was now quite broken; one fit of sickness succeeded another; and what completed the ruin of her health, was the disorders that prevailed among her ministers. While the parliament continued sitting, they maintained some appearance at least of unity; the fear of an attack from that branch of the legislature; but their fears being now over, they laid no restraint upon their passions. Their disputes became intolerable; they so far forgot their duty to her majesty, and regard for their country, that whenever Oxford and Bolingbroke met in council, they studied rather to oppose each other, than to settle or pursue any regular plan of government. And their jealousies arrived at last to such a shameful height, that it is believed a quarrel that happened between them in the queen's presence, hastened her death. It is certain that the severest reproaches passed between these ministers on the twenty-seventh of July, when Oxford was deprived of the white staff. He imputed his disgrace to Bolingbroke, lady Masham, and the chancellor, and told them, in the queen's presence, "That he had been wronged and abused by lies and misrepresentations; but he should be revenged, and leave some people as low as he found them." These expostulations could not fail of shocking the queen, whose ill state of health rendered her incapable of supporting such unexpected strokes of fortune. She could not help reflecting that she must have been abused by some, if not by all her principal ministers; and she actually intimated to one of her physicians, that she should not long survive it.

She was soon after seized with a lethargic disorder, and the next day was struck with an apoplexy. She, however, however, recovered, in some degree, the use of her senses, and during that interval, gave the white staff to the duke of Shrewsbury, bidding him use it for the good of her people. This was the last act of her government, dying on the first of August, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign.

Few sovereigns ever merited higher eulogiums than this princess, without either great talents or a cultivated mind, and without spirit sufficient to give her an ascendant over her favourites. She shone in the qualities of the heart, a sincere piety, a steady virtue, a tender affection for her subjects, an invariable affability, as well in government as in civil life. From these qualities which will render her name respectable, she was called "The good queen Anne;" a title more glorious than all the victories that adorned her reign.

Queen Anne had six children, but none survived her. The duke of Gloucester only reached his twelfth year, all the rest died very young.

From the Accession of George I. to the Conclusion of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748.

G E O R G E I.

A.D. 1714. THE death of the queen disconcerted all the schemes of the Tories. Bolingbroke was left without power, and consequently incapable of executing the designs he had formed. His genius, more brilliant than solid, was not calculated for the government of a nation. The Jacobites had flattered themselves that hereditary right would prevail in favour of the pretender, over the motives which had excluded that family from the crown of England. They were deceived, and George I. was proclaimed without opposition. The protestant succession had been too firmly established by acts of parliament to be shaken by the attempts of a few persons, who were no friends to the peace of their country.

George I. was in the fifty-fifth year of his age, when queen Anne sunk into the grave. He was endowed by nature with an extensive genius, which had been cultivated by an excellent education; which, together with his experience, rendered him perfectly capable of supporting the weight of a crown, to which he was now called by the voice of the people. He had long been known to the English, having commanded a body of troops in the allied army, where his valour and conduct had gained him universal esteem.

The king was proclaimed on the first of August, at the usual places, and with the usual ceremonies, in the cities of London and Westminster. The streets were crowded with multitudes of people, for having been born and educated in the bosom of the protestant church, all who wished well to the established religion in England, had fixed their hopes on him for the preservation of their constitution both in church and state.

The same ceremonies were performed in all the cities and towns in England without the least disturbance any where except at Oxford, where a person, in the habit of a student, brought a letter to the mayor, requiring him to proclaim the pretender. The mayor communicated the letter to the vice-chancellor, and both of them transmitted copies of it to Mr. secretary Bromley, representative for the university of Oxford, who returned them letters of thanks. In the mean time, the vice-chancellor offered a reward of a hundred pounds for discovering the author.

All possible precautions had been taken by the lords of the regency, to guard against a surprize. They dispatched such officers of the army as they knew they could trust to their respective posts; gave orders to reinforce the garrison at Portsmouth; and sent vessels out to view the harbours of France and discover whether any preparations were making for an invasion of this kingdom. They chose Mr. Joseph Addison for their secretary, and ordered all letters and dispatches directed to the secretary of state to be sent to him. This was a mortifying circumstance to lord Bolingbroke, who was now obliged to stand at the door of the council-chamber, with his bag and papers, and to receive orders from those, whom, but a few days before, he expected to command.

Both houses of parliament met at Westminster on the very day the queen died, and a speech was made by the chancellor in the name of the lords-justices, suitable to the occasion of their meeting. Both houses voted addresses of condolance and congratulation to the king. The commons actually made good all funds which had been granted by parliament, for the security of any money that had or should be advanced for the public service. These addresses being transmitted to the king, his majesty returned very affectionate answers.

M. d'Iberville, the French minister, having for some time behaved in a very haughty manner, was, on the queen's death, so apprehensive of being insulted by the people, that he sent a letter to the duke of Ormond, desiring his protection. The duke laid the letter before the lord-justices, who ordered a party of the trained-bands to guard his house. He had already assured the regency, "That his master would inviolably maintain the treaty of peace, concluded at Utrecht, particularly with regard to the settlement of the crown in the house of Hanover." And the earl of Peterborough, who arrived in London from France on the seventh of August, informed the regency, that the French king had given him the same assurances. Some days after Iberville received a letter from the marquis de Torcy, approving of his conduct, and another from his master Lewis XIV. to the British regency, containing the same declaration. That monarch also declared, "That having been informed of some reports, which hinted his having designed to make some alterations in the late treaty, he thought proper to declare, as he had already done to the earl of Peterborough, that these reports were altogether false and groundless; that the king of Spain having sent the cardinal del Guidice as ambassador to France, which might create some suspicions, his most christian majesty had desired the king his grandson, to recal him: and that the elector of Brunswick Brunswick having, some time before the death of the queen, signified that whenever his accession to the crown of Great Britain should take place, he would cultivate an acquaintance with France, his most christian majesty, on his part, assured the lords-justices, that he would do all that lay in his power to maintain a good intelligence and amity between the two crowns."

But sensible how little dependence could be placed on the French king's assurances, they exerted all their power to put the nation in a posture of defence, as the only way of rendering any designs against the peace of the realm abortive. While they were thus nobly employed, Mr. Murray arrived with expresss from Hanover, informing the regency that his majesty had deferred his departure for some days, and ordered the lords-justices to remove lord Bolingbroke from his office of secretary of state. This was accordingly done on the thirty-first of August, and not without particular marks of displeasure; for the seals were not only taken from him, but the doors of his office were locked and sealed.

The sudden death of the queen confounded the court of France; they found it was impossible for them to oppose the protestant succession to the crown, and therefore they acknowledged George, elector of Hanover, king of Great Britain. The pretender, who had been flattered with the hopes of assuming the English throne, both by the ministers of France and England, no sooner heard that the queen was either dead, or past all hopes of recovery, than he posted immediately to Versailles; but before he reached the palace, he was met by the marquis de Torcy, who told him, "That his most christian majesty was surprized at his being returned into his dominions, knowing the engagements he was under, with regard to the succession of the crown of Great Britain in the house of Hanover; and therefore desired him to quit his territories immediately." Astonished at this unexpected reception, the pretender made a melancholy visit to the queen-dowager of England, who resided at Chaillot, and returned to the court of Lorraine at Luneville.

The king landed at Greenwich on the sixteenth of September about six in the evening, where he was received by the duke of Northumberland, captain of the life-guard, and the lord-chancellor at the head of the lords of the regency. His majesty chose to walk to his house in the park, accompanied by most of the nobility, and great numbers of the principal gentry, through an infinite croud of persons of all conditions. The parliament had already granted him the same revenue enjoyed by the late queen. And instead of five thousand pounds promised in the late reign, one hundred thousand were now offered to any one who should take the pretender in case he attempted an invasion.

The duke of Marlborough was distinguished among the croud of courtiers; for king George was both a politician and a soldier; and his maxim was, "Never to abandon his friends, to do justice to all, and to fear nobody." The king made his public entry on the twentieth of September, with great pomp and magnificence. Above two hundred coaches belonging to the nobility and gentry, all drawn by six horses, preceded the king's. He was met at St. Margaret's-hill in Southwark, by the lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder, sheriffs and officers of the city of London, in whose name Sir Peter King, the recorder, made a congratulatory speech. The lord-mayor delivered the sword to the king, who returned it, and he bore it in the procession.

The animosity which subsisted between the two parties, was at this time higher than ever. The whigs, who had been in disgrace during the four last years of the queen's reign, were filled with resentment at the usage they had received from the tories, and hoped to have full satisfaction under a reign, the commencement of which they considered as the end of their humiliation. The tories were apprehensive of a fall, and this had engaged several of their leaders in practices not only dangerous, but directly opposite to the measures for maintaining the protestant succession. The king, highly esteemed for his prudence, seemed capable of distinguishing the heats of faction, or at least of turning them to the public good. Possibly he might have succeeded had he maintained an equal balance between the two parties, and endeavoured to unite them by a proper conduct and address; but whether he thought it impossible to reconcile the turbulent passions of the two parties, or whether the prejudice he had conceived against the tories carried him beyond proper bounds, he gave all his confidence to their adversaries, who were more devoted to the new government.

This tended only to widen the breach, and increase the number of enemies to the principles of the revolution. Not only the papists espoused the interest of the abdicated family, but also great numbers of those who professed the tenets of the church of England; and it was feared they would join with the catholics, to dethrone a prince whom they considered as a foreigner. Neither the famous distinction between a king de jure and a king de facto, nor the doctrine of passive obedience, was yet forgot; and hence several refused to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration.

The changes that ensued were a farther proof that the tories, were to expect no favour from the new king. Bolingbroke had been dismissed before his arrival, and lord Townsend appointed secretary of state in his room. The command of the army was taken from the duke of Ormond, and restored to the duke of Marlborough. The lord Cowper was made lord-chancellor; the earl of Wharton, lord privy-seal; and the earl of Sunderland, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Devonshire was appointed steward of the household, in the room of earl Pauler; and Mr. James Stanhope, secretary of state in the room of Mr. Bromley. The duke of Somerset was made master of the horse, the duke of St. Albans captain of the band of pensioners, and the duke of Argyle commander in chief of the forces in Scotland. Mr. William Pulteney was made secretary at war, and Mr. Robert Walpole receiver and paymaster-general of all the forces in Great Britain, and paymaster to Chelsea hospital. This revolution extended to other public employments, and the whigs triumphed with as high a hand on this occasion, as they had before been humbled and disgraced. Such beginnings could not fail of inflaming the animosity of parties, and cherishing the spirit of contention.

The great art of gaining the hearts of the people consists not of obtaining the attachment of a few at the expence of others. George shewed more wisdom in declaring, "that he was resolved to maintain the churches of England and Scotland as by law established; that he hoped to succeed without infringing that toleration granted to the protestant non-conformists, a toleration so advantageous to commerce and the public welfare; and that he would be particularly careful to secure property, that precious right of the subject, which essentially constitutes the happiness of the nation."

The king was crowned at Westminster on the fifteenth of October, with great magnificence. There was never so great an appearance of lords spiritual and temporal, as on this occasion, no less than seventeen archbishops and bishops, though two sees were vacant; all the dukes in and about London, except the duke of Buckingham; seventy earls and viscounts, and among them the earl of Oxford and viscount Bolingbroke, and as many barons. The demonstrations of joy throughout the kingdom seemed to be general on this happy event, some few places excepted, where the populace shewed their hatred to the protestant succession by riots and outrages.

One of the principal articles of the treaty of Utrecht prescribed to Lewis XIV. was the demolition of Dunkirk, a port which had cost immense sums, and was become an object of jealousy and terror to the English. On executing the treaty, the canal of Mardyke was widened, and made a port almost equal to that of Dunkirk. Lord Stair, the English ambassador, complained of this in very strong terms. It is said the answer made by Lewis was, "I have always been master at home, sometimes abroad; do not make me remember it." Voltaire assures us that this answer, which he thinks an improper one, did not come out of the mouth of Lewis. But whether this was really the case or not, his pride was certainly capable of uttering it. Times were now altered; and the English obtained satisfaction: the works of Mardyke were suspended and afterwards demolished under the regency.

The spirit of mutiny still prevailed in the nation. The complaints of the vanquished party echoed from every quarter, and in almost every town. The Tories did not fail to call in the interest of the church as a sanction to their own. "Down with the whigs! Sacheverel for ever!" was the cry. The pretender, who went by the title of the chevalier de St. George, attempted to avail himself of this juncture, by publishing a manifesto, wherein he complained that a foreign prince had been proclaimed contrary to the fundamental and incontestable law of hereditary right; observing that no act of parliament could set aside that law, and that his subject, by violating it were no less injurious to themselves than to him.

A. D. 1715. It is natural to suppose that the king would be very desirous of having the advice of his parliament. A proclamation was accordingly published for dissolving the old and calling a new parliament. This proclamation was filled with complaints against those who had shewed themselves disaffected to the established government. It was added, "that his majesty hoped such persons only would be elected as were capable of putting an end to the present disorders, and that particular attention would be paid to such as had supported the protestant succession when in danger." Nothing could be more clearly pointed out to the whigs, nor mark more strongly on which side he wished the votes to fall. A very strong opposition was, however, made by the tory party; but the influence of the court, and the spirit of liberty among the people, produced the desired effect: a large majority were on the side of the revolution. The new parliament met on the seventeenth of March, and the commons having elected Mr. Spencer Compton for their speaker, the session was opened on the twenty-first, by the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"This being the first opportunity, I have had of meeting my people in parliament, since it pleased God to call me to the throne of my ancestors, I most gladly make use of it, to thank my faithful and loving subjects for that zeal and firmness, which hath been shewn in defence of the protestant succession, against all the open and secret practices that have been used to defeat it; and I shall never forget the obligation I have to those, who have distinguished themselves upon this occasion.

"It were to be wished that the unparalleled successes of a war, which was so wisely and cheerfully supported by this nation, in order to procure a good peace, had been attended with a suitable conclusion; but it is with concern I must tell you, that some conditions, even of this peace, essential to the security and trade of Great Britain, are not yet duly executed, and the performance of the whole may be looked upon as precarious until we have formed defensive alliances, to guaranty the present treaty.

"The pretender, who still resides in Lorraine threatens to disturb us, and boasts of the assistance which he still expects here, to repair his former dis-appointments.

"A great part of our trade is rendered impracticable. This, if not retrieved, must destroy our manufactures, and ruin our navigation.

"The public debts are very great, and surprizingly increased, ever since the fatal cessation of arms. My first care was to prevent a farther increase of those debts, by paying off forthwith a great number of ships, which had been kept in pay, when there was no occasion for continuing such an expence.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I rely upon you for such supplies as the present circumstances of our affairs require for this year's service, and for the support of the public faith. The proper estimates shall be laid before you, that you may consider of them, and what you shall judge necessary for your safety, I shall think sufficient for mine.

"I doubt not but you will concur with me in opinion, that nothing can contribute more to the support of the credit of the nation, than a spirit of observance of all parliamentary engagements.

"The branches of the revenue, formerly granted for the support of the civil government, are so far encumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds which remain and have been granted to me, will fall greatly short of what was at first designed for maintaining the honour and dignity of the crown. And since it is my happiness, as I am confident you think it yours, to see a prince of Wales, who may, in due time succeed me on the throne, and to see him blessed with many children, the best and most valuable pledges of our care and concern for your posterity, this must occasion an expence, to which the nation has not for many years been accustomed, but such as surely no man will grudge, and therefore I do not doubt but you will think of it with that affection which I have reason to hope from you.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you, waiting the issue of this first session. Let no unhappy divisions of parties here at home divert you from pursuing the common interest of your country. Let no wicked insinuations disquiet the minds of my subjects. The established constitution in church and state shall be the rule of my government. The happiness, ease and prosperity of my people shall be the chief care of my life. Those who assist me in carrying on these measures I shall always esteem my best friends; and I doubt not but I shall be able, with your assistance, to disappoint the designs of those who would deprive me of that blessing which I most value, the affection of my people."

The addresses of both houses were agreeable to the king's speech. The concluding clause by which they declared "they would take such measures as would preserve the public credit, restore our trade, extinguish the very hopes of the pretender, and recover the reputation of the kingdom in foreign parts; the loss of which they hoped to convince the world by their actions, is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general," gave occasion to a very warm debate. The Tories alledged "that it was injurious to the late queen's memory, and clashed with that part of his majesty's speech, which recommended to both houses, the avoiding the unhappy divisions of parties, and that it was unjust to condemn persons without hearing them." Lord Bolingbroke, in particular, was very warm on this subject, and moved that part of the clause might be omitted. But it was carried against him, and the address was presented in its original.

But though lord Bolingbroke spoke with great boldness in parliament, and appeared every where in public with great boldness, yet he did not think proper to submit his conduct to a fair trial. He departed privately from London, and disguised as a servant to la Vigne; he passed over to the continent, and landed at Calais on the thirtieth of March.

Some of the members had the boldness to propose an examination of the royal proclamation. Sir William Windham declared it was indefensible, unprecedented cedented, and of dangerous consequence to the constitution of parliament. The house was immediately in a flame, and the cry, "To the tower! to the tower!" resounded from every corner. He was ordered to withdraw, and one hundred and twenty members accompanied him. The rest agreed that he should be reprimanded by the speaker, which was done accordingly.

The whigs now determined to enquire into the late negotiations, and a secret committee was appointed for that purpose. The famous Sir Robert Walpole was appointed chairman, who, after delivering the report, impeached lord Bolingbroke of high-treason, as the author of a particular treaty concluded with Lewis XIV. Lord Coningsby immediately rose, and said, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand; I impeach the head: he has impeached the clerk; I the judge: he the scholar; I the master. I impeach Robert Harley, earl of Oxford; of high-treason, and other crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Harley, the earl of Oxford's brother, spoke in his defence. He alledged, "that the minister had done nothing but by the immediate order of the queen; that the peace of Utrecht was an advantageous peace, and, as such, it had been approved by two parliaments."

On the twenty-first of June, Mr. secretary Stanhope impeached James duke of Ormond of high-treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. The duke was defended by several members. Sir Joseph Jekyll in particular said, "That if there was room for mercy, he hoped it would be shewn to that noble, generous, and courageous peer, who had, in a course of many years, exerted those great accomplishments for the good and honour of his country: that as the statute of Edward III. on which the charge of high-treason against him was founded, had been mitigated by subsequent acts, the house ought not, in his opinion, to take advantage of that act against the duke, but only to impeach him of high crimes and misdemeanors. This occasioned a long and warm debate; but the question being put, it was carried for his impeachment. The duke perceiving he was already pre-judged by his enemies, who were determined to carry on the impeachment with the whole force of their party, consulted his own safety, by withdrawing himself from the kingdom.

The articles being agreed to by the commons, lord Coningsby, attended by most of the members who had voted for the impeachment, went up to the lords, and, at the bar of the house, impeached Robert earl of Oxford of high-treason; demanding, at the same time, that he might be sequestered from parliament, and committed to safe custody. The earl, after protesting his innocence, and observing, that if ministers of state, who only executed the orders of their sovereign, were responsible for their conduct, every member of that house might one day be exposed to the same misfortunes. He added, "My lords, I am about to take my leave of your lordships and this honourable house, perhaps for ever. I shall lay down my life with pleasure, in a cause favoured by my dear royal mistress. When I consider that I am to be judged by the justice, honour and virtue of my peers, I shall acquiesce, and retire with great content: and, my lords, God's will be done."

He was suffered to return to his own house, in custody of the black rod, in consequence of his being ill of the gravel. The next day he was brought to the bar of the house, where he received a copy of the articles, and was allowed a month to prepare his answer. But he was ordered immediately to the Tower, notwithstanding his bad state of health. The populace followed him in crowds, inveighing against his persecutors:

These rigorous proceedings increased the popular ferments. London and Westminster had a little before been filled with tumults. The populace, on the king's birth-day, burnt William in effigy, and insulted the courtiers. The jacobites were in motion in every part of the kingdom; and his majesty informed the parliament, that the nation was threatened with an invasion. The habeas corpus act was immediately suspended, and orders were issued to arrest all suspected persons. A reward of one hundred thousand pounds was offered to any person who should take the pretender, dead or alive. Troops were raised; a fleet was equipped; and every necessary preparation made for rendering the attempt abortive. The alarm was not without foundation. The tories had held a correspondence abroad; and the pretender relied on the promises of Lewis XIV. but that prince dying on the first of September, the face of affairs in that kingdom was totally changed. The regency devolved to the duke of Orleans, who had neither the power nor inclination to sacrifice the treasures of the state he governed to support the interest of a wretched exile, who had very small hopes of obtaining the crown he claimed as his birth-right.

The jacobites had, however, proceeded too far, to think of retreating; and the earl of Mar erected the pretender's standard on Brae-Mar on the twenty-fifth of September. He afterwards caused him to be proclaimed at Cullinstown, Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and several other places. Several suspected persons were seized, and committed to the castle of Edinburgh. Two vessels found means to elude the vigilance of the English fleet, and landed several officers, together with a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, in Scotland. This was, however, the only assistance the pretender received from France. The regent found it his interest to cultivate a friendship with the English ministry. The rebels now published a manifesto, in which they gave their reasons for taking up arms; enumerated the grievances of the nation, and promised to redress them.

About the same time, a conspiracy was formed at Edinburgh for surprising the castle, on the eighth of September, between eleven and twelve at night; but the design was rendered abortive by the care and vigilance of Sir Adam Cockburn.

The duke of Argyle being appointed commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, set out, on the ninth of September, for that kingdom; and about the same time the earl of Sutherland offered his service to go and raise the highland clans in the most northern counties of Scotland, which was readily accepted, and the Queenborough man of war was appointed to carry him thither. Several other Scottish peers, particularly the duke of Roxburgh, the marquises of Anandale and Tweedale, the earls of Selkirk and Loudon, Ross, Haddington, Forfar, &c. readily embraced this opportunity of shewing their loyalty to their king, and zeal for their country.

About this time a dangerous conspiracy was discovered and rendered abortive in England. On the second of September, lieutenant-colonel Paul, who had a company in the first regiment of foot-guards, was secured, and the next day sent prisoner to the Gatehouse. He was charged with enlisting men for the pretender's service, and other treasonable practices. The titular duke of Powis, a Roman catholic, was committed to the Tower for high-treason; and the lords Landsdown and Duplin were also taken into custody, and a warrant issued for apprehending the earl of Jersey. At the same time, Mr. secretary Stanhope acquainted the commons, "that he was commanded by the king to communicate to them, that his majesty, having just cause to suspect that Sir William Windham, Sir John Packington, Mr. Edward Hervey, sen. of Combe, Mr. Thomas Foster, jun. Mr. John Anstis, and Mr. Corbet Kynaston, were engaged in a design to support the intended invasion of this kingdom, had given orders for apprehending them, and desired the consent of the house, to his causing them to be committed and detained, if he should judge it necessary." This was unanimously agreed to and an address presented to his majesty for that purpose.

The consent of the house being thus obtained, warrants were immediately issued for apprehending the six members, two of whom, Hervey and Anstis, happened to be then in town, were immediately secured. Mr. Hervey, some few days after, stabbed himself with a knife, in two or three places of his breast; but the wounds did not prove mortal. Mr. Foster bid defiance to justice, and with the assistance of two Romish lords, raised a rebellion in Northumberland. Sir John Packington was brought up to town from Worcestershire, and after being examined before the council, was honourably discharged. Mr. Kynafton made his escape, and colonel Huike, a captain in the foot guards was sent down with a messenger to apprehend Sir William Windham, in Somersetshire. On their arrival, which was about five in the morning, they desired to see Sir William immediately; but the porter told them he was in bed and could not yet be spoke with. The colonel told him he came express, and that the person with him had a packet of letters of such consequence, that it was absolutely necessary for him to inform his master of their arrival immediately. This alarmed the porter, and Sir William immediately leaped out of bed, and came in his gown to the colonel, who told him he was his prisoner, the messenger at the same time shewing him the badge of his office. Sir William said he readily submitted; but desired no noise might be made to frighten his lady, who was then with child. They now entered a chamber, where the colonel, seeing Sir William's coat and waistcoat lie, told him he had orders to seize all his papers, and that he must take leave to search his pocket, where he found a bundle of papers, which he secured. Sir William would have diverted him by offering him the keys of his escrutores in order to search for more; but the colonel had now secured those of the most importance. Sir William desired the colonel would stay till seven o'clock, when he would order his carriage to be ready; adding, he would only retire and put on his clothes, and take leave of his lady. This was granted; but the colonel soon found he had been too complaisant; Sir William instead of returning made his escape. On the colonel's return a proclamation was issued, promising a thousand pounds reward to any person who should apprehend Sir William.

Sir William found it would be in vain to secret himself, and therefore repaired to London, and surrendered himself to the earl of Hertford, captain of one of the troops of life-guards. After a strict examination before the council, he was committed to the Tower; notwithstanding the duke of Somerset offered to bail him. This refusal so irritated the duke, that he immediately resigned all his places.

On the twenty-first of September, the king came to the house of peers, and after giving the royal assent to such bills as were ready, put an end to the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am persuaded you are all by this time very desirous of some recess, and that it cannot be deferred longer without great inconvenience to your private affairs.

"But before I can part with you, I must return you my most sincere thanks, for your having finished, with so much wisdom and unanimity, what I recommended to your care; and particularly I thank you gentlemen of the house of commons, for the provision you have made, as well for the support of the honour and dignity of the crown, as for the other necessary occasions of the public; especially for your having done it by means so little burthensome to my people; which I assure you recommends the supplies to me, above any other circumstance whatever.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The open and declared rebellion, which is now actually begun in Scotland, must convince all, who do not wish to see us given up into the hands of a popish pretender, of the dangers to which we have been and are still exposed.

"I thought it incumbent on me to give you the earliest notice of the designs of our enemies; and I cannot sufficiently commend the zeal and dispatch with which you empowered me, at a time when the nation was in so naked and defenceless a condition, to make such preparations as I shall think necessary for our security. You shall have no reason to repent of the trust and confidence you repose in me, which I shall never use to any other end, than for the protection and welfare of my people.

"It was scarce to be imagined, that any of my protestant subjects, who have known and enjoyed the benefits of our excellent constitution, and have heard of the great dangers from which they were wonderfully delivered by the happy revolution, should by any arts or management, be drawn into measures, that must at once destroy their religion and liberties, and subject them to popery and arbitrary power. But such has been our misfortune, that too many of my people have been deluded, and made instrumental to the pretender's designs, who had never dared to think of invading us, or raising a rebellion, had he not been encouraged by the success his emissaries and adherents had actually had in stirring up riots and tumults, and by the farther hopes they entertain of raising insurrections in many parts of my kingdoms.

"The endeavouring to persuade my people that the church of England is in danger under my government, has been the main artifice employed in carrying on this wicked and traitorous design. This insinuation, after the solemn assurances I have given, and my having laid hold on all opportunities to do every thing that may tend to the advantage of the church of England, is both unjust and ungrateful. Nor can I believe so groundless and malicious a calumny can make any impression on the minds of my faithful subjects, or that they can be so far misled, as to think the church of England is to be secured by setting a popish pretender on the throne.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The proofs this parliament has given of their unshaken duty and affection to me, and of their love and zeal for the interest of their country, will recommend you to the good opinion and esteem of all, who have their religion and liberty truly at heart, and has laid a lasting obligation upon me; and I question not, but by your farther assistance in the several counties to which you are going, with the blessing of Almighty God, who has so frequently interposed in favour of this nation, I shall be able to disappoint and defeat the design of our enemies.

"Our meeting again to do business, early in the next winter, will be useful on many accounts, particularly that the sitting of parliaments may be again brought into that season of the year which is most convenient; and that as little delay may be given as possible to your judicial proceedings; and I shall at present give such orders to my lord chancellor, as may not put it long out of my power to meet you on any sudden occasion."

The designed insurrection in the western counties was so well concerted, and the conspirators so powerful and numerous, that the jacobites at Bath, depending on their majority, openly asserted, that the affair of Scotland was only a diversion to draw the king's troops that way; but that the effectual attempt would soon be made in the west. The government, however, having received information of the secret proceedings of the malecontents, took such measures as rendered all their designs abortive. Their first attempt was intended to be against Bristol, which they proposed to make a place of arms. This was prevented by the earl of Berkeley, lord-lieutenant of the county, and governor of that city, who repaired thither immediately and took the necessary precautions for securing that important place. Several persons were apprehended, and among the rest Mr. Hart, a merchant, who was charged with having collected a vast quantity of warlike stores for the use of the conspirators. Besides part of Lumley's regiment of horse, and the two battalions of Stanwix and Pocock, who were already in Bristol, colonel Chudleigh's Chudleigh's regiment of foot marched thither about the beginning of October. At the same time lord Windfor's regiment of horse, and Rich's dragoons, under the command of major-general Wade, marched to Bath, which was both the rendezvous and one of the arsenals of the conspirators. Upon a strict search the king's officers discovered and seized eleven chests of fire-arms; a hoghead filled with basket-hilted swords, and another of cartouches, three pieces of cannon and one mortar, which had been buried underground. About two hundred horses were seized; and eight of the principal leaders.

The disaffected in the north of England were more successful than their brethren in the west. Measures had been concerted at London by the pretender's friends, some time before the insurrection broke out in Northumberland. The insurgents received great assistance from captain John Shaftoe, a half-pay officer, and captain John Hunter, in North Tyne, who had a commission from queen Anne to raise an independent company. Besides these was captain Robert Talbot, an Irish papist, who had been in the French service. He carried an account of the resolutions formed in London, and by his advice every necessary precaution, was taken for preventing any part of their scheme from transpiring.

The first appearance of their rising in arms was about the latter end of September, when the earl of Derwentwater was informed, that a warrant was issued by the secretary of state for apprehending him, and that the messengers were already in the neighbourhood of Durham. This sufficiently alarmed the whole party, and a meeting of all the chiefs was held, where it was resolved to throw off the masks, and openly declare their intentions. The pretender was accordingly proclaimed in several towns with the usual formalities. They did not doubt of being received very willingly into Newcastle; but on approaching the town, they were surprized to find the gates shut against them. They marched immediately to Hexham, where they seized all the arms and horses they could meet with and proclaimed the pretender. Here they received advice, that the lord Kenmure, the earls of Nithsdale, Carnwath, and Wintoun, who had taken up arms in the west of Scotland, had entered England to join them and advanced as far as Rothbury. They accordingly left Hexham on the nineteenth of October, and after a long march, joined the Scots that night. They all marched the next day to Woller, where they received advice that the highlanders, who had crossed the Forth under Mackintosh were marching to join them, upon which they continued their route to Kelfo in Scotland.

The rebellion being thus kindled both in England and Scotland, it was thought proper to demand from the States-general, the six thousand men stipulated by treaty. The demand was immediately complied with, and the necessary preparations were made for their embarkation. But as it would be some time before the Dutch could land in England, Pitt's regiment of horse, and three regiments of foot, had been sent for from Ireland, and landed at Chester, the beginning of October. Associations were also entered into throughout the kingdom for the defence of his majesty's person and government; and the lords-lieutenants of the counties were empowered to form into troops or companies such as should be willing to associate, and to grant them commissions in the king's name.

On the twenty-fifth of October, lieutenant general Carpenter, who was ordered to advance against the rebels, left Newcastle and marched at the head of one regiment of foot and three of dragoons, towards Kelfo, where the rebels still continued. A council of war was immediately called in their camp, and it was resolved to march directly to Jedburgh. They did not long continue in that place; but by marches and countermarches gave general Carpenter the slip, and passed into England, reaching Lancaster on the seventeenth of November. On their approach colonel Chartres, who commanded a few troops in that place, proposed to blow up a fine bridge over which they were to pass, in order to obstruct their entry; but the inhabitants opposed this proposition. The colonel therefore thought it advisable to leave the town, after having ordered some barrels of powder to be thrown into a well in order to prevent their falling into the hands of the rebels. The insurgents having entered Lancaster performed the usual ceremony of proclaiming the pretender, and levying the public revenues. Though the town could easily have been made tenable against a much greater number of forces than the government could at that time send against them, and though they expected succours from different quarters, yet they continued no longer in Lancaster than the ninth, when they left the place, carrying with them six pieces of cannon which they found in the town. They directed their march to Preston, where the horse arrived the same night, but the foot halted about mid-way. They entered the town without opposition; Stanhope's regiment of horse, and a regiment of militia, having thought proper to retire on their approach. Here they were joined by a considerable number of gentlemen and their followers, most of them Roman catholics. This greatly disgusted the Scotch party, who flattered themselves with being joined by the Tories.

General Carpenter, being informed that the rebels were in full march towards Lancaster, resolved to pursue them with the dragoons only; persuaded he should be joined by the king's troops in the west. He was not mistaken, and his troops being joined by a considerable body under general Willes, they marched to Ribble bridge, fully resolved to attack the insurgents in Preston. The very morning of their arrival general Forster gave orders for the rebel army to march, not in the least suspecting the king's troops were so near. He had depended for intelligence from the gentlemen of Lancaster, who had promised that no party of the king's troops should advance within forty miles of Preston without his knowledge. He was accordingly surprized when he received advice that general Willes was within sight of the town. He advanced, however, at the head of a party of horse to view the posture of the royal forces; and perceiving they were in full march towards him, he returned immediately to the town to give them a warm reception.

The rebels were not in the least discouraged; but cheerfully made the necessary preparations for their defence. They barricaded the avenues and posted detachments in the streets, bye-lanes and such houses as were most proper for galling their enemies. The gentlemen volunteers were posted in the church-yard, under the command of the earls of Derwentwater, Wintoun, Nithsdale, and Kenmure. General Forster formed four grand barriers; the first a little below the church, commanded by brigadier Mackintosh, and supported by the gentlemen volunteers in the church-yard. The second was situated at the head of a lane leading to the fields, and commanded by Charles Murray. The third was near a windmill, and commanded by the lord of Mackintosh. And the fourth in the street leading to Liverpool, commanded by major Millar and Mr. Douglas. They threw up several intrenchments in an instant, and did every thing in their power to make a stout resistance; but were guilty of one capital error, which sufficiently discovered their ignorance or rather infatuation. For in the morning, upon the first intelligence of general Willes's approach, they had detached Macpherson, at the head of an hundred men to take possession of Ribble bridge, which was the only pass by which the royalists could march to Preston, the river being fordable only in two places, one below, and the other above the bridge, both which could have easily been rendered impassable. The bridge terminates a long narrow lane, where Oliver Cromwell met with a stout resistance from the king's forces. But Mr. Forster, instead of taking advantage of this pass, which he might easily have done to the destruction of the royal forces, ordered his detachment to return to the town, and by that means gave general Willes a free passage.

The general expected to have met with great opposition in forcing the pass, and made all the necessary preparations for that purpose; but was greatly surprized to find it abandoned. He even suspected there was some ambuscade laid for him, and therefore resolved to proceed with great caution. After viewing the hedges and laid the way open for the cavalry to enter, he perceived not the least appearance of an enemy. He therefore concluded they had abandoned the town, and were endeavouring, by long marches, to return to Scotland; but in this he was also mistaken; for on his advancing near the town, he perceived them in a proper posture to give him a warm reception, though in a place where he could attack them with more ease than at Ribble-bridge. He immediately prepared for an attack, and disposed his troops in such a manner, as he might best annoy them in the town, and prevent their escape.

After viewing the disposition of the insurgents, and finding all the avenues leading to the town strongly barricaded with two pieces of cannon planted on each, he resolved to make two attacks at the same time. Accordingly a captain and fifty dragoons were drawn out of each of the five regiments, and ordered to attack the avenue leading to Wigan. Another large detachment were ordered to attack the avenue leading to Lancaster.

The first attack was upon that barricade below the church, where old brigadier Mackintosh commanded. He received the king's troops very gallantly, and with a terrible fire both from the barricade and the tops of the houses, obliged them to retire to the end of the town. At the same time lord Forrester, who commanded the other detachment, entered the avenue of Wigan, and took possession of two large houses within fifty yards of the barricade, where he posted his men, finding it impracticable to force the barricade; but from these houses, which overlooked the whole town, he greatly annoyed the enemy; and from those houses they received the greater part of the damage they sustained during the action. These houses had been possessed by the highlanders, when the barricade was commanded by Mackintosh; but they were called off to support the barricade. This gave the king's troops an opportunity of seizing them, and perhaps saved the remains of that detachment, which suffered very greatly in this bold attack.

The other barricades were attacked with great resolution, but without success; the king's troops being obliged to retire to the extremities of the town, and remain satisfied till the next day, night now hindering their farther approaches. Hitherto the rebels appeared to have acted with courage and intrepidity, and to have the advantage since they had repulsed the enemy in every attack, with very little loss to themselves, and considerable slaughter on the side of the royalists. But they did not long continue in their resolution to defend themselves to the last extremity; for being informed next morning that general Carpenter was arrived with a reinforcement of troops to surround them, their courage failed them; and from that moment they acted with great irresolution, and despaired of success.

About ten in the morning general Carpenter, accompanied by the earl of Carlisle, lord Lumley, and colonel Darcy, arrived at Preston, and marched himself to the Manchester side. He found that the rebels had been attacked the day before without success, and that most part of the king's horse and dragoons were crowded together in a deep narrow lane near the end of the town, in so inconvenient a manner, that it was impossible to draw up above three or four in front; and on viewing the ground towards the river, he saw that there were no troops posted at the end of Fisher-gate-street, to block up that part of the town, where several of the rebels were said to have escaped the night before. This street leads to a marsh or meadow, which joins to that part of the river Ribble, where there were two good fords, being the high road towards Liverpool; and towards the end of the same street, there was another barricade mounted with two pieces of cannon. General Carpenter therefore ordered colonel Pitt to post his two squadrons on that marsh; and going back to the end of the town, he ordered a communication to be made for the troops to assist each other, in case of a fall from the rebels. Invented on all sides, and sensible, when too late, of their condition, the insurgents began to consider what was to be done. The highlanders were for falling out upon the king's forces, and dying like men of honour, sword in hand; but they were over-ruled, and not allowed to make any fall. The motion was not indeed communicated to the whole body; a capitulation having been proposed by general Forster, as it was expected good terms might be obtained from the king's officers. Colonel Oxburgh offered to go to the head quarters of the royalists and treat for a surrender. He accordingly repaired to general Willes, and offered to lay down their arms and submit, on his promising to recommend them to his majesty's mercy. The general told the colonel he could not treat with rebels; for as they had killed several of the king's subjects, they must expect to suffer the same fate. The colonel replied, that he hoped as he was a man of honour and an officer, he would not put persons to death who were willing to submit. Willes answered, all he could do for them was, that if they laid down their arms and submitted themselves prisoners at discretion, he would prevent the soldiers from cutting them in pieces, till he had received farther orders; adding, that he would give them no more than an hour to come to a final resolution. Oxburgh returned into the town to acquaint Mr. Forster of the general's answer. The Scots were very unwilling to accept of such conditions, and Willes consented to allow them a longer time to give their answer: At last they agreed to surrender themselves prisoners at discretion.

The same day the rebels surrendered at Preston, the battle of Dumblain was fought, between the earl of Mar, who commanded the insurgents, and the duke of Argyle, commander in chief of the royal army. The duke's forces, amounting to three thousand five hundred men, were drawn up upon the heights above Dumblain, having that town at about a mile and a half on his left, and a wet boggy morass, called Sheriff-moor, on his right.

The earl of Mar's army, amounting to about nine thousand men, were drawn up opposite the royal army. Mar, who knew his number was much greater than Argyle's, extended his lines as far as possible, in order to take him in flank, and in this disposition advanced to the attack.

Argyle, who till now supposed that Sheriff-moor was unpassable, saw that two or three nights' frost had rendered it capable of bearing. At the same time he perceived the rebels coming down the moor with an intent to flank him, having their right extended a considerable distance beyond the point of his left. He found himself therefore obliged to alter the disposition of his front, to prevent his being surrounded; which, on account of the scarcity of general officers, was not so easily done. The battle was very obstinate and very bloody; different accounts were given of it, and both sides claimed the victory. But from the consequences, it appeared that it was really on the side of the royalists. The earl of Mar retreated to Perth, and abandoned the design he had formed of crossing the Forth and joining his southern neighbours; nor was it ever after attempted. About eight hundred of the rebels were slain on the field of battle, and eighty-two taken prisoners, among whom were several persons of distinction.

The loss of this battle, and the castle of Inverness, which was taken from them soon after, greatly intimidated midated the rebels. The earl of Seaforth, and the marquis of Huntley, left the rebels to defend their own territories; but were soon after obliged to make their submission. The marquis of Tullibardine also left the army; and many of the clans, seeing no likelihood of coming to an action, returned to their respective habitations.

On the twelfth of November general Captain Williamson arrived at Whitehall with the news that the barrier-treaty was signed. And three days after general Cadogan, with the Dutch troops, arrived in England, and marched immediately to Edinburgh. General Cadogan set out immediately for Scotland, a resolution having been taken to dislodge the rebels from Perth. A considerable train of artillery was also shipped at the Tower and sent to Scotland for the use of the army.

On the twenty-third of December the pretender landed at Peterhead in the north of Scotland, with only six gentlemen in his retinue; among whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, son to the duke of Berwick. He repaired directly to Perth, where he appeared in public, and was proclaimed with great solemnity. He published several proclamations, and the soldiers were employed in fortifying the town; but on the approach of the English and Dutch forces under the command of general Cadogan, he abandoned Perth and retired to Dundee, and afterwards to Montrose; where, finding the royal army were in full march after him, he embarked on the sixteenth of January on board a small vessel which landed him and his attendants in France. The principal officers in the rebel army followed his example, and passed over to the continent.

Such was the issue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families; and which, instead of promoting the interest of the Stuart family, served only to strengthen the protestant succession in the house of Hanover.

A. D. 1716. On the ninth of January the parliament met at Westminster, when his majesty made the following speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The zeal and affection to my government, and the vigilant care for the safety of the nation, which you have shewn in your respective counties, have not only answered my expectations, but give me assurances that you are met together, resolved to act with a spirit becoming a time of common danger, and with such a vigour as will end in the confusion of all those who have openly engaged in this rebellion, and in the shame and reproach of such as, by secret and malicious insinuations, have fomented, or by an avowed difference, encouraged these traitorous enterprises.

"It is, I doubt not, a great satisfaction to you to have observed, that the powers you entrusted me with for the preservation of the public safety, have been employed in the most proper and effectual manner, and made strictly subservient to those purposes only for which you intended them. And you must have had the pleasure to reflect with me, that as the measures taken for our defence have been just and necessary, so it has pleased the divine providence to bless them with a series of suitable success. And I cannot but take this opportunity of doing justice to the officers and soldiers of the army, whose brave and faithful discharge of their duty, has disappointed our enemies, and contributed so much to the safety of the nation.

"I did hope that the detecting and preventing the designed insurrections in some parts of the kingdom, and the defeating in others, those who had taken up arms against me, would have put an end to this rebellion. But it is plain that our enemies, animated by some secret hopes of assistance, are still endeavouring to support this desperate undertaking, and the pretender, as I have reason to believe, is now landed in Scotland.

"It is, however, with pleasure I can acquaint you, that notwithstanding these intestine commotions, Great Britain has, in some measure, recovered its influence and reputation abroad. The treaty for settling the barriers for the Netherlands, is now fully concluded; between the emperor and the states-general under my guaranty. The king of Spain has agreed to a treaty, by which that valuable branch of our commerce will be delivered from the new impositions and hardships to which it was subjected by the late treaties; and will stand settled for the future on a foot more advantageous and certain than it ever did in the most flourishing time of any of my predecessors; and the treaty for renewing all former alliances between the crown of Great Britain and the states-general, is brought very near to its conclusion.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I must rely on your affection to me, and your care and concern for the safety of the nation, to grant me such supplies, as may enable me to restore and secure the peace of the kingdom, and I will order estimates of the expences to be laid before you.

"Among the many unavoidable ill consequences of this rebellion, none affects me more sensibly than that extraordinary burden, which it has, and must create to my faithful subjects. To ease them as far as lies in my power, I take this opportunity of declaring, that I will freely give up all the estates that shall become forfeited to the crown by this rebellion, to be applied towards defraying the extraordinary expences incurred on this occasion.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is a matter of the greatest uneasiness to me, that the first year of my reign, the whole course of which I wish to have transmitted to posterity, distinguished by the fair and endearing marks of peace and clemency, should be clouded and overcast with so unnatural a rebellion, which, however impotent and unsuccessful, a due care may render it, in all other respects, does most sensibly afflict me, by the calamities it has brought on many of my faithful subjects, and by those indispensable returns of severity, which their sufferings, and the public safety, so justly call for. Under this concern my greatest comfort is, that I cannot reproach myself with having given the least provocation to that spirit of discontent and calumny that has been let loose against me, or the least pretence for kindling the flame of this rebellion.

"Let those whose fatal counsels laid the foundation of all these mischiefs, and those whose private discontents and disappointments, disguised under false pretences, have betrayed great numbers of deluded people into their own destruction, answer for the miseries in which they have involved their fellow subjects. I question not, but that, with the continuance of God's blessing, who alone is able to form good out of evil, and with the cheerful assistance of my parliament, we shall in a short time see the rebellion end, not only in restoring the tranquillity of my government, but in procuring a firm and lasting establishment of that excellent constitution both in church and state, which it was manifestly designed to subvert; and that this open and flagrant attempt, in favour of popery, will abolish all other distinctions among us, but of such as are zealous assertors of the liberties of this country, the present establishment, and the protestant religion, and of such as are endeavouring to subject the nation to the revenge and tyranny of a popish pretender."

To this speech both lords and commons returned a dutiful address, and the commons declared, that they thought themselves obliged, in justice to their injured country, to prosecute, in the most rigorous manner, the authors of those destructive counsels, which had drawn down those miseries upon the nation. Accordingly they expelled Mr. Forster, general of the Northumbrian rebels, and impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Wintoun and Carnwarth, and the lords Widdrington, Kenmure, and Nairn, of high-treason. They likewise brought in a bill of attainder against the earl of Mar, William Murray, filed the marquis of Tullibardine, the earl of Linlithgow, and John lord Drummond. All these noblemen, the earl of Wintoun only excepted, pleaded guilty to their indictments; and Wintoun was afterwards found guilty.

Great interest was made to save the lives of these noblemen but without effect. Their unhappy wives begged with tears the intercession of parliament. The house of lords presented an address, praying his majesty to reprieve such of the condemned lords as should deserve his clemency. The king was, however, inflexible; he answered very coldly that he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of his crown and the security of his subjects. The earl of Derwentwater and Kenmure were beheaded on Tower-hill on the twenty-fourth of February. The earl of Carnwath, and the lords Widdrington and Nairn were reprieved. The earl of Nithsdale was to have suffered with Derwentwater and Kenmure; but his mother saved him by a generous artifice: she obtained permission to take her last leave of him, ran to embrace him in prison; and they instantly changed dresses. By this means he escaped, and she continued in prison. On being interrogated at the bar of the house of lords concerning the place of the earl's retreat, she observed a profound silence. At last, in justice to her generous affection and virtues, she was discharged. Wintoun also afterwards made his escape, as did Forster and Mackintosh out of Newgate. Twenty-two of the rebels were hanged in the country, and several at Tyburn; particularly colonel Oxburgh, Mr. Paula clergyman; and Mr. Hall a justice of peace.

This rigour exercised against the delinquents rendered the ministry odious to all who had any sense of humanity. The court was alarmed, and it was determined to take the most proper measures for preventing the effect. The present parliament was at the devotion of a ministry; but it was greatly feared a new one might not be so; they might possibly return upon the ministry the rigour they had exercised upon the people. The act of triennial parliaments, that bulwark of the national liberty, was justly alarming to a ministry, evidently inclined to despotism. It was indeed dangerous to attack a law of this importance, but the juncture was extremely favourable. It was therefore determined to repeal this act, though justly considered as the principal defence of the people against the attempts of arbitrary power. A motion was accordingly made in the house of peers for effecting this purpose. It was said, that too frequent elections kept up the spirit and activity of parties, fomented family discords, brought on ruinous expences, and gave occasion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign powers; that in the present state of affairs it was necessary to remedy the evil; and that there was no better method of extinguishing the flames of rebellion, which were always ready to break out anew, than by bringing in a bill for extending the duration of parliaments. These arguments were strenuously opposed by several of the peers. "The fundamental laws of the kingdom," they said "required frequent parliaments. They were established by the custom of many ages; they were particularly interesting to the liberty and glory of the subject. What confidence could foreigners repose in a nation that would idly sacrifice its most precious rights? The expence of elections, the cabals they might occasion would be so far from weakening the new and dangerous system, that they would promote it by the interest individuals would have in procuring seats in a long parliament. The ministry would find stronger means and motives to corrupt the members. And might not the same parliament, that had effected its prolongation, effect also its perpetuity, which alone was wanting to destroy the privileges of the people, and the constitution itself." These arguments however national, however forcible, were too weak to operate against the influence of the court. Disputes and animosities took place, but the two houses passed the bill, which extended the duration of parliaments to seven years.

Thus the king triumphed over a people, whose affection it was doubtless his interest to sollicit.

The obedience of parliament, however, supplied, in some measure that affection; and his affairs calling him into Germany, the parliament annulled the clause in the act of limitation which prevented his going out of the kingdom. A period was accordingly put to the session of parliament; and the king passed over to the continent on the seventh of July.

The king had acquired the duchies of Bremen and Verden, of which Charles XII. of Sweden had been stripped by his enemies. That young hero, with all the personal valour, and virtues much superior to those of Alexander, but like him borne away with a passion for war, that sin against humanity, having escaped from his captivity at Bender, breathed nothing but vengeance, and was impatient to repair his misfortunes. Incensed against the king of Great-Britain, he was resolved if possible to ruin him; and accordingly undertook to head an invasion in favour of the pretender. He who had placed Stanislaus on the throne of Poland, might hope to restore the Stuarts to their hereditary right in England. His ambassadors at London and the Hague secretly conspired in this design. The measures were artfully taken; and the dangers that attended the execution seemed to lessen. A multitude of the malecontents were desirous of joining the standards of so great a general, and the mobs in London, rose to the highest pitch of outrage.

Informed of the design formed by the Swedish monarch, the king suddenly quitted Hanover, and returned to London. He had strengthened himself by an alliance with the states-general, but this would not have been sufficient to remove the danger had the secret remained impenetrable. On the king's arrival the Swedish ambassador, count Gyllenbourg, was put under arrest; and baron Gortz, the Swedish resident at the Hague, was also confined. The plan of this intended invasion was this: a number of vessels had been purchased, and were to repair under various pretences to Gottenburgh in Sweden, about the latter end of March, the season when the easterly winds, which are fair for bringing ships from the Baltic to England, generally prevail. Eight thousand foot, and four thousand horse, all picked men, together with a formidable train of artillery, a large quantity of amunition and provisions, and arms sufficient for twenty thousand men, were to have been embarked on board these ships. The confederates were so sure of being joined by the discontented party in England, that the design had been intrusted to a very few persons only; nor was there any formal treaty drawn up between the parties engaged in this affair; the mutual interest each had in the success was thought more binding than the most solemn engagements.

In the mean time the arresting the Swedish ambassador, and seizing his papers by which the whole plot was discovered, alarmed the other foreign ministers residing at the court of London. They complained to the ministry of this outrage committed against the law of nations. The two secretaries of state wrote circular letters to these residents, assuring them that in a few days they should be made acquainted with the reasons for this extraordinary proceeding. All, except the marquis de Montelone ambassador from Spain, were satisfied with this intimation. He replied, that he was extremely sorry no other way could be found to preserve the peace of the kingdom, than that of arresting the person of a public minister; and seizing his papers, the sacred repositories of his master's secrets; and that in whatever light those two facts might seem to be understood, they very sensibly wounded the law of nations. This, however, was far from being one: the English monarch acted consistently with the strictest principles of justice in imprisoning his enemy. Gyllenbourg had violated the law of nations by conspiring against the prince to whom he was sent in a public character; and therefore the English had an undoubted undoubted right to dispense with the observance of the same law, by arresting his person.

A.D. 1717. The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of February, and the session opened with the following speech from the throne:

“My lords and gentlemen, I was in hopes that the success which it has pleased God to give us, in defeating the late rebellion, might have secured to this nation, peace, plenty and tranquillity.

“My endeavours have not been wanting, during your recess, to improve the happy prospect which was in view, by entering into such negotiations, as I judged most conducive to those good ends: and it is with pleasure I can acquaint you, that many defects in the treaty of Utrecht, which very nearly affected the trade, and even the security of these kingdoms, have been remedied by subsequent conventions, the happy consequences of which have already very sensibly appeared; by the flourishing condition of our trade and credit.

“By the alliance lately concluded with France and the states-general, we are soon to be eased of all future apprehensions from Dunkirk and Mardyke. The pretender is actually removed beyond the Alps: His adherents are deprived of all hopes of support and countenance from France; and even the assistance of that crown is stipulated to us in case of exigence.

“It seemed reasonable to expect, that such a situation of affairs at home and abroad, would have recovered from their delusion all such of our subjects, as had unhappily been seduced by the craft and wickedness of desperate and ill-designing men, and thereby have afforded me the opportunity, which I desired, of following the natural bent of my own inclinations to lenity, by opening this session with an act of grace. But such is the obstinate and inveterate rancour of a faction amongst us, that it hath again prompted them to animate and stir up foreign powers to disturb the peace of their own native country: they will chuse rather to make Britain a scene of blood and confusion; and to venture even the putting this kingdom under a foreign yoke, than give over their darling design of imposing a popish pretender.

“I have ordered to be laid before you copies of letters, which have passed between the Swedish ministers on this occasion, which contain a certain account of the projected invasion: And I promise myself from your experienced zeal and affection to my person and government, that you will come to such resolutions, as will enable me, by the blessing of God, to defeat all the designs of our enemies against us.

“Gentlemen of the house of commons, I did hope, the putting an end to the late rebellion, would have so far secured the peace and tranquillity of the nation, that I might, consistently with the safety of my people, have made a considerable reduction of the forces. But the preparations that are making abroad to invade us, oblige me to ask such supplies, as you shall find absolutely necessary for the defence of the kingdom.

“You are all sensible of the insupportable weight of the national debts, which the public became engaged for from the necessity of the times, the pressures of a long and expensive war, and the languishing state of public credit. But the scene being now so happily changed, if no new disturbances shall plunge us again into straits and difficulties, the general expectation seems to require of you, that you should turn your thoughts towards some method of extricating yourselves, by reducing, by degrees, the debts of the nation.

“My lords and gentlemen, I have an entire confidence in you, and have therefore nothing to ask; but, that you would take such measures, as will best secure your religion and liberties. While you preserve those inestimable blessings, I shall sit easy and safe on my throne, having no other view but the happiness and prosperity of my people.”

The letters of the Swedish ministers being read in both houses, very loyal addresses were voted to his majesty. But when the supply came under consideration, several members declared against it, insisting that it was contrary to the custom of parliament; that new alliances ought not to be purchased with money. After long and violent debates, the supply was granted, though only by a small majority. And thus Great Britain found herself engaged in continental connections, because the reigning family possessed estates in Germany; an inconvenience which has more than once been felt, and which always must be felt whilst a standing army shall be thought necessary to the prince as it is uneasy to the people.

The carrying this vote by so small a majority alarmed the king, and a change in the ministry was thought necessary. Accordingly Sir Robert Walpole, first commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Pulteney, secretary at war; Mr. Methuen, secretary of state; the duke of Devonshire, president of the council; and several others, resigned their employments; so that the ministry underwent an almost total revolution. The earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addison were appointed secretaries of state; Mr. Stanhope, first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; Mr. Craggs secretary at war; the earl of Berkeley, first commissioner of the admiralty; the duke of Bolton lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and the duke of Newcastle lord-chamberlain.

The earl of Oxford, who had languished about two years in the Tower, availed himself of this quarrel in the ministry, to demand his trial. The most violent disputes happened between the two houses concerning the manner of the process. The lords insisted that the commons should first proceed to make good the articles of high treason against the earl, before they attempted to prove those relating only to high crimes and misdemeanors. The commons refused to proceed only as they stood in the impeachment. The breach became wider between the two houses, and the lords refused a conference which had been demanded by the commons. The accusers were now ordered to appear and make good their charge against the earl of Oxford; they refused, and the noble prisoner was set at liberty. The lower house were so exasperated at this proceeding, that they excepted the earl, together with Mr. Prior and some others, from the act of grace which the king had, at length, granted. This act did not, however, efface the impressions the severity preceding it had occasioned. A prudent clemency knows how to forgive with propriety, and how to induce repentance. George was accused of not imitating his predecessors in this particular.

Great preparations were made for opposing the descent meditated by the Swedish monarch, but an unforeseen event rendered them unnecessary. Charles XII. who was on the point of concluding an alliance with the czar of Muscovy, was slain at the siege of Frederickshal in Norway; and all that he had taken remained in the hands of the possessors. George had not yet received the investiture of the dutchies of Bremen and Verden, for which reason he thought proper to support the emperor Charles VI. against Spain. Whilst Charles, as an ally of the Venetians, was carrying on a war against the Turks, a war famous for the victories of prince Eugene; Philip V. under some specious pretence, made himself master of part of Sardinia. Cardinal Alberoni his minister, a man of unbounded ambition, exposed the throne of Spain to dangers which a more prudent minister might have avoided. The emperor, France, England, and Holland, concluded the famous treaty, called the Quadruple Alliance, for the tranquillity of Europe. This treaty regulated the division of certain demesnes. Philip was dissatisfied, and preparations were made for a war. The parliament fixed the number of troops to sixteen thousand men, and passed a bill to punish mutiny and desertion. An act so contrary to the genius of the English, sufficiently displays what extraordinary alteration of principles had taken place; though the œconomy of military discipline might possibly be best consulted by this measure.

A. D. 1718. The purpose of the quadruple alliance was to oblige the king of Spain to make peace with the emperor, to whom the duke of Savoy was to give up Sicily in exchange for Sardinia. This treaty, too advantageous to the house of Austria, whose power it augmented in Italy, was rejected by the court of Spain; and the king of England prepared to support his mediation by force of arms. Sir George Byng was sent into the Mediterranean with twenty-one sail of the line: The Spanish Squadron, consisting of twenty-seven sail, was discovered on the ninth of August, in the Faro of Messina. On sight of the English Squadron they stood away, but still in order of battle. On the eleventh six of the Spanish men of war, with all the galleys, fire-ships, bomb-vessels and store-ships, separated from the main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore, upon which Sir George Byng detached captain Walton, with six ships of the line, in pursuit of them. The admiral himself continued to chase the main fleet, and about ten o'clock the battle began. The Spaniards made but a poor defence; and were soon totally defeated, and all taken, except three ships of the line and three frigates, which escaped to Malta.

The Spaniards exclaimed against this conduct of the admiral, as a breach of the law of nature. Several members of both houses of parliament, and Mr. Walpole in particular, blamed it with great asperity. Complaint was also made of the injury done to commerce by this irregular and precipitate rupture; but these complaints had little effect. The parliament, where the interest of the court prevailed, approved of all that had been done, and war was declared against Spain.

About this time the duke of Orleans, regent of France, discovered a plot formed by cardinal Alberoni against his person. That intriguing and audacious minister proposed nothing less than overturning the whole French government. This discovery produced a declaration of war. France, who had lavished her blood and her treasures in supporting Philip V. now turned his enemy. So easily are the ties of nature broken by political motives. Alberoni, always rendered impatient by opposition, projected an invasion of England in favour of the pretender. He caused him to pass into Italy, and projected methods for landing him in Scotland, where he flattered himself the discontented party would join him.

A. D. 1719. The designs of Alberoni were not long a secret in England, and the most proper measures were taken to render it abortive. The king came to the house of peers, and informed both houses of parliament of the designs of the Spaniards, and received the strongest assurances of support. The commons desired him to augment his forces by sea and land, in such a manner as he should think proper, promising to make good any increase of expence that might be incurred on that account.

In the mean time the fleet that had been for some time sitting out at Cadiz, consisting of ten men of war, and a considerable number of transports, on board of which were six thousand regular troops, and arms for ten or twelve thousand, put to sea. The duke of Ormond, who was impatient to revenge his disgrace, was appointed the chief conductor of this undertaking, with the title of captain-general of the king of Spain: he was ordered to publish, in proper places, a declaration in that king's name, wherein he said, that for many very good reasons, he was resolved to send part of his land and sea forces into England and Scotland, to serve as auxiliaries to king James. What had confirmed him in this resolution, was the certain advices he had received, that great numbers of persons in the two nations, notwithstanding their strong inclination to acknowledge that prince for their sovereign, durst not openly declare for him, because they did not see him supported by any of the states of Europe, who were either powerful or willing to assist them: that to remove this and other difficulties that might arise, he declared he was determined to use all his power for the restoration of a prince, in a country belonging to him by undeniable right: that he hoped providence would favour for just a cause; but that the fear of ill success might not hinder any person from declaring readily for him, he promised a secure retreat in his dominions to all that should join him, and, in case they were forced to leave their country, he declared that every sea or land officer should have the same rank as he enjoyed in Great Britain, and the soldiers be received and treated as his own.

But the duke never had an opportunity of publishing this declaration. The Squadron was overtaken by a dreadful storm off Cape Finisterre, and lasted two days and two nights, whereby the fleet was entirely dispersed, and disabled from pursuing their voyage. The admiral's ship of sixty-four guns, having lost all her masts, made for the coast of Spain; and the rest did the same, and with great difficulty reached their own harbours. Two frigates, however, which sailed from Port-Parage, reached Kintail in Scotland, and landed their forces, consisting of three hundred men, together with the earls of Seaforth and Marischal, and the marquis of Tullibardine. They joined the rebel army, consisting of about two thousand one hundred highlanders. But they were soon after defeated by general Wightman; and the Spaniards surrendered themselves prisoners. The chief of the rebels, Seaforth, Tullibardine, Marischal, and some others, escaped to Lewis or the Orkney islands. Soon after the emperor's general, supported by admiral Byng, subdued part of Sicily. Lord Cobham, assisted with a small Squadron of ships commanded by captain Meghels, took Vigo, and Ponta Vedra, and destroyed the ships in the harbour. The king of Spain, unable to resist so many enemies, acceded to the quadruple alliance, and dismissed Alberoni, whose ambitious projects had involved him in this war.

But before these events happened, the king, came, on the eighteenth of April, to the house of peers, and put an end to the session with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am now come to put an end to this session, in which you have shewn many great and reasonable proofs of your duty and affection to my person and government, and of your care for the safety and welfare of your fellow subjects.

"By the blessing of God and our own endeavours we have hitherto disappointed the designs of our enemies, who flattered themselves with success from our unhappy divisions.

"We perceive, by the rash and desperate counsels which have lately prevailed in the court of Spain, and the desperate and extravagant projects of one ambitious man, though not capable of giving fears to their neighbours, may occasion to them some expence and trouble.

"That court, being influenced by counsels odious and destructive to the Spaniards, who find themselves neglected and oppressed, after having endeavoured to foment conspiracies and seditions, both here and in France, and stooped to practices unusual, accompanied by manifestoes of a stile unheard of among great princes, at last proceeded to a knowledge the pretender.

"As this news has given great surprize to all Europe, I question not but it will be received by every good Briton with indignation and contempt.

"It is our happiness, at this juncture, to find ourselves assisted by the greatest powers in Europe, against against an enemy, that has no allies, but those who would betray the government under which they live and are protected.

* Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I thank you very heartily for the supplies you have granted me this year. The manner in which you have raised them, without any new burden to my people; the great addition you have made to the fund for sinking the debts of the nation, the discharge of the exchequer bills, and the provisions you have made to pay whatsoever remains justly due to foreign states and princes, are the strongest proofs of your wisdom, as well as your zeal for my service, and the good of your country. You may observe I have hitherto been very cautious of making use of the power you have given me to increase our forces by sea and land. If your enemies should oblige me to a greater expence, it shall be employed for your service. This is what the trust you reposed in me requires at my hands, and what I owe to so dutiful and affectionate a house of commons.

* My lords and gentlemen,

"There being nothing more desirable at all times than a firm union among protestants, I reflect with satisfaction on a law you have passed this session, which will, I hope, prove effectual to that purpose. As it is a signal instance of moderation and indulgence in our established church, so I hope it will beget such a return of gratitude from all dissenting protestants, and will greatly tend to our honour and security, both which I shall ever have near at heart.

"I have also looked upon the glory of a sovereign and the liberty of a subject as inseparable, and think it is the peculiar happiness of a British king to reign over a free people. As the civil rights, therefore, and privileges of all my subjects, and especially of my two houses of parliament, do justly claim my most tender concern, if any provision designed to perpetuate these blessings to your posterity remains imperfect, for want of time, during this session, maturely to discuss and settle matters of so great importance, I promise myself you will take the first opportunity to render my wishes for your happiness complete and effectual, and to strengthen the union which is of so much consequence to the welfare of this kingdom.

"If the circumstances of my affairs shall allow of my going abroad this summer, I shall take the same care of your interests as if I remained here. The many negotiations which will be on foot, to restore the peace of the North, in which the trade and tranquillity of this kingdom may be very much concerned, will make my presence there of great use to these my dominions. And as, in that case, I design, by the blessing of God, to meet you early next winter, I will only recommend to you most earnestly, that, laying aside all animosities, you would, in your several counties and stations, use your utmost endeavours to preserve the public peace, and see a due execution of the laws."

A. D. 1726. We are now come to a period which will always be remarkable in English history for the destructive South-sea scheme, when the insatiable hand of avarice threw the whole kingdom into confusion. At the opening the session of parliament, his majesty had earnestly recommended the consideration of proper means for reducing the national debt, which amounted to more than fourteen millions. A scheme was accordingly formed for reducing all the public funds into one, in order to discharge the whole. This plan was laid by Sir John Blount, one of the directors of the South-sea company, a person possessed of all the art, plausibility and boldness requisite in such an undertaking. This scheme he communicated to Mr. Aislabie, chancellor of the exchequer, and also to one of the secretaries of state. It was considered by the ministry, and appearing to be very advantageous to the public, it was adopted.

It now remained to carry the plan into execution, and the South-sea company laid a proposal before the house of commons, offering to give three millions five hundred thousand pounds for the privilege of taking in all the irredeemable debts, amounting to near eight hundred thousand pounds per annum, and also the redeemable debts then at the bank and exchequer, mostly bearing five per cent. interest, either by purchase from the proprietors, or by subscriptions into their capital stock. This method of increasing their capital was looked upon as a very valuable acquisition, and excited the jealousy of the bank of England, and accordingly the directors of that opulent body laid their proposal before the commons. They offered to give above five millions for the same privilege. This rivalry proved the destruction of the whole. The South-sea company made a second proposal: they offered no less than seven millions and a half, in case these debts should be subscribed, and in proportion for any part of them. They also proposed to pay to the use of the public one year's purchase of all the irredeemable long annuities that should be brought into their capital. The bank now made a second proposal, more advantageous, in several respects, to the public, than that of the South-sea company. They obliged themselves to give seventeen hundred pounds bank-stock for every hundred pounds irredeemable long annuities. But this offer was far from intimidating the South-sea company. Determined, at any rate, to obtain the liberty of taking in the public debts, they offered to incorporate all the funds of the bank, East-India company and exchequer, into their own capital. It was not, indeed, thought proper to adopt this proposal, but the very rumour of such a scheme raised their stock to one hundred and twenty per cent. They now offered five hundred thousand pounds more than the bank, and also four years, and a half purchase upon all annuities they should take into their capital, which, if all the annuities were taken in, the whole would amount to three millions, five hundred and sixty-seven thousand, five hundred and three pounds; so that their whole offer was seven millions, five hundred sixty-seven thousand five hundred pounds. Besides this, they not only offered to circulate one million of exchequer-bills gratis, but to pay three per cent. for that million, and one year's purchase of such annuities as should be subscribed into the company's capital in fourteen months.

This proposal was adopted, and a bill was ordered to be brought into the house of commons for that purpose. While the bill was under consideration, the company's stock rose to near four hundred per cent. The bill passed both houses, but not without great opposition in the house of lords, and received the royal assent. The king passed over to his German dominions, and every thing seemed to promise domestic tranquillity. But the restless passion of avarice soon obliterated these pleasing appearances, and threw the nation into the utmost distress.

The South-sea company finding their stock began to sink in its value, caused a notion to be propagated, that Gibraltar and Portmahon would be given up to the Spaniards, in exchange for a large district in Peru, where the English trade to the South-sea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffused with great industry, inspired the people with such extravagant hopes, that two millions of original stock were subscribed in less than five days after the close of the session of parliament. The stock of the company rose to above a thousand per cent. The Mississippi scheme in France, which had just turned that kingdom upside down, was better founded. But the passion for riches, like other passions, is sometimes too blind to be directed by experience, and too deaf to listen to the voice of reason. The desire of acquiring large fortunes drew into the snare a multitude of unhappy people, who became the dupes of interested artifice. The rage of stock-jobbing filled every head, and swallowed up every other idea. Whigs, tories, jacobites, the nobility, the clergy, physicians, lawyers, merchants, and the very women themselves, were all animated with the same spirit: all converted their money into paper; all believed they should grow rich by parting with their riches. But this charm was of no long duration. It was soon found, that the South-sea commerce, the ruinous foundation of these enormous proceedings, was far from being sufficient to answer the views of avarice. Stocks therefore fell prodigiously; and several projects, set on foot by the fraudulent industry of covetousness, were totally rejected. No money appeared; payment of the dividends was stopped; and public credit vanished. Families, without number, were reduced to beggary; and the intoxication of frivolous and senseless hope was succeeded by the cries of despair.

Recourse was now had to the bank for supporting the South-sea company. That corporation entered into an agreement to take a quantity of the South-sea stock at four hundred per cent. in payment for three millions seven hundred and seventy-five thousand pounds, redeemable debt, which the company was to repay at Lady-day and Michaelmas of the ensuing year. This was afterwards called the Bank-contract, the very rumour of which caused the South-sea stock to rise prodigiously. But this rise did not continue long. It soon appeared that this supposed contract had no real foundation, being nothing more than a temporary expedient, to quiet the clamours of the people. The directors of the bank, finding their property to be in danger of being swept away by that portentous tide of ruin, which bore down every thing before it, renounced their agreement; and the South-sea company, deprived of this support, sunk under its own weight.

The king, who had been in Hanover since the beginning of the summer, hastened to England, to remedy a disorder that threatened the destruction of the whole nation. In this alarming crisis, the king opened the session of parliament on the eighth of December, with the following speech from the throne.

“My lords and gentlemen,

“Since we last parted, the face of our affairs abroad is become more favourable. The peace in the south wants only the form of a congress; and that of the north is brought much nearer to a conclusion. I shall, at a proper time, order the several treaties I have made to be laid before you; by which you will perceive the success of our endeavours to establish peace throughout Europe, and to secure and support the protestant religion. At the same time, I can never sufficiently express my concern for the unhappy turn of affairs, which has so much affected the public credit at home.

“Gentlemen of the house of commons,

“I do most earnestly recommend it to you, that you consider of the most effectual and speedy methods to restore the national credit, and fix it upon a lasting foundation. You will, I doubt not, be assisted in so commendable and necessary a work, by every man that loves his country, and especially by the several great societies of this kingdom. I hope you will, on this occasion, remember, that all your prudence, your temper and resolution, are necessary to find out and apply the proper remedies to our misfortunes; which will, if you succeed, serve to increase that reputation you have so justly acquired; particularly, if you shall be able, notwithstanding these difficulties, to discharge a part of the national debt. I have ordered the several estimates to be laid before you of the expence of the ensuing year, and desire you to dispatch the supplies necessary for them.

“My lords and gentlemen,

“I am glad to observe to you, that our trade appears to have been more extended this year than in the preceding. We have the most flourishing navy of any nation whatsoever to protect us; and I hope you will turn your thoughts to the best methods for the securing and enlarging of our commerce. You may depend upon my hearty concurrence to all such provisions as shall appear to you necessary for the good of my people.”

The two houses shewed the greatest zeal to effect that necessary particular, the re-establishment of the public credit. All the members of the commons, who had been concerned in these iniquitous proceedings, were expelled the house. Knight, cashier to the South-sea company, perceived the storm, and passed over to the continent, to prevent its effects. All the rest were determined to stand the shock of national resentment, which was now raised to an enormous height. The commons seemed to have laid aside all party distinctions, and to vie with each other in promoting an enquiry of so much importance to their country. Favour was disregarded by all; the guilty were examined; the estates of the directors were confiscated, except a bare subsistence; the creditors were indemnified as far as circumstances would permit; and public credit, the destruction of which must have ruined the nation, was restored. The parliament could not possibly have done a greater favour to the nation. Sir Robert Walpole contributed largely, by his genius and application, to the success of this perplexed affair. Upon this he was restored to favour, and made first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer.

A. D. 1721. Among the many disputes that had been agitated in the parliament, some ecclesiastical matters had a considerable share. In 1718, a bill had passed for annulling the severe acts against the non-conformists. Dr. Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, asserted, that such bills were laws for persecution; and that if bills of intolerance were admitted in ecclesiastical matters, all persecutions of infidels, of heathens, and even the popish inquisition, might be justified. In the mean time, the increase of impiety and licentiousness awakened the zeal of those who were of more rigid sentiments. Unbounded luxury, unbridled debauchery, and an affected contempt of religion and morality, were the effects of a system which had made gold and silver the objects of human worship. Atheism walked abroad, without a mask, in open day. The Deity himself was despised, or not acknowledged; and no restraint, no principle, no rule, remained. One of the peers delivered a very pathetic speech on this subject; in consequence of which, a bill was brought in against blasphemy and profaneness, in which were several clauses not perfectly consistent with the liberty of conscience previously granted to the non-conformists. These clauses occasioned a strong opposition to the bill. Disputes grew warm, and gave occasion to some very singular propositions. One of the bishops having represented the evil consequences of the reigning vices, lord Onslow answered with derision, that the prelate must have been himself a great sinner, since he had lost large sums in the South-sea. The duke of Wharton, famous for his licentiousness, declared that he was neither a friend to blasphemy, nor an enemy to religion; but, at the same time, could not approve the bill, because he thought it contrary to scripture; and taking a bible out of his pocket, he read several passages, and thence concluded that the bill ought to be rejected. The opinion of the earl of Peterborough was still more singular: he declared, that he was very willing to have a parliament king, but neither a parliament God nor a parliament religion; and that if the bill laid any restraint on him, on this account, he would go to Rome, and canvass for a cardinal's hat; for he thought it much better to treat of such matters in the conclave than in the house of peers. The supporters of the bill finding an opposition they did not expect, moved that it should be postponed. This was agreed to, and the whole was dropped.

It was very late before the supplies were granted, and even then not with the usual cheerfulness and alacrity. All difficulties were, however, at last surmounted, and the king obtained sufficient supplies to satisfy his engagements with Sweden; engagements that that had very little relation to the English. His majesty put an end to the session on the tenth of August, when he declared in his speech, that he entertained a most sincere concern for the sufferings of the innocent, and a just indignation against the guilty, relative to the South-sea scheme: that he had readily given his assent to such bills as had been presented to him for punishing the authors of the late misfortunes, and for obtaining restitution and satisfaction to those who had been injured by them in so notorious a manner; that they could not fail to have observed the discontents occasioned by this unhappy event, which had been industriously fomented by wicked and seditious libels; but he doubted not but by their prudent conduct in their several counties, all the enemies of his government, who flattered themselves with being able to blow up the present complaints into popular disaffection, would be finally disappointed in their designs and expectations.

A dreadful plague having for some time raged at Marseilles, a proclamation was published, forbidding any person to come into England from any part of France, between the Bay of Biscay and Dunkirk, without certificates of health. Lazarettos were ordered to be built, and lines to be drawn round where the contagion had penetrated. On this occasion it was represented, that to shut up the people in hospitals, by order of government, and to draw lines round the places infected, were practices inconsistent with the constitution of England, incompatible with the mildness of a free government, and more particularly odious, as they imitated, in this respect, the government of France. These arguments, though strongly refuted, procured a repeal of the act of parliament that had given offence. The idea of constitutional liberty prevailed over public security.

A.D. 1722. The parliament having finished all the business before them by the month of March, they were dissolved, and another ordered to be chosen. Soon after the dissolution of parliament, the great duke of Marlborough paid the debt of nature. His faculties had been for some time greatly impaired; he was no longer capable of shining either in the senate or the field. He was succeeded as master of the ordnance and colonel of the first regiment of foot guards, by the earl of Cadogan.

The election was so well managed, that most of the members of the former were returned for the new one, which met on the nineteenth of October, and the session was opened with the following speech from the throne:

“My lords and gentlemen,

I acquainted you when we parted last, of our having renewed all our treaties of commerce with Spain; since which peace is happily restored in the north, by the conclusion of a treaty between the czar and the king of Sweden, and by that which I have made with the Moors, a great number of my subjects are delivered from slavery; and all of them who trade to those parts of the world, are, for the future, secured from falling under that dreadful calamity.

In this situation of affairs we should be extremely wanting to ourselves, if we neglected to improve the favourable opportunity, which this general tranquillity gives us, of extending our commerce, upon which the riches and grandeur of this nation chiefly depend. It is very obvious that nothing would more conduce to the obtaining so public a good, than to make the exportation of our own manufactures, and the importation of the commodities used in the manufacturing of them, as practical and easy as possible. By this means the balance of trade may be preserved in our favour, our navigation increased, and greater numbers of our poor employed.

I must therefore recommend it to you, gentlemen of the house of commons, to consider how far the duties upon these branches may be taken off and replaced, without any violence of public faith, or laying any new burden upon my people. And I promise myself, that by a due consideration of this matter, the produce of those duties, compared with the infinite advantage that will accrue to the kingdom by their being taken off, will be found so inconsiderable, as to leave little room for any difficulties or objections.

“The supplying ourselves with naval stores, upon terms the most easy and least precarious, seems highly to deserve the ear and attention of parliament. Our plantations in America naturally abound with most of the proper materials for this necessary and essential part of our trade and maritime strength: and if, by a due encouragement, we could be furnished from them with those naval stores, which we are now obliged to purchase and bring from foreign countries, it would not only greatly contribute to the riches, influence, and power of this nation, but by employing our own colonies in this useful and advantageous service, divert them from setting up and carrying on manufactures, which directly interfere with those of Great Britain.

“Gentlemen of the house of commons,

“It will be a great pleasure to me, if, in raising the supplies of this year, it may be so ordered, that my people may reap some immediate benefit from the present circumstances of affairs abroad. I have ordered the estimates to be prepared for the service of the ensuing year, and also an account of the debts of the navy to be laid before you. You must be sensible of the ill consequences that arise from such a large debt remaining unprovided for; and that as long as the navy and victualling bills are at a very large discount, they do not only affect all other public credit, but greatly increase the charge and expence of the current service. It is therefore very much to be wished, that you could find a method of discharging this part of the national debt, being of all other the most heavy and burdensome; and by that means have it in your power to ease your country of some part of the taxes, which, from an absolute necessity, they have been obliged to pay.

“My lords and gentlemen,

“The unspeakable misery and desolation that has raged in some parts of Europe, cannot but be a sufficient warning to us to use all possible precautions to prevent the contagion from being brought in among us; or, if those kingdoms should be visited with such a fatal calamity, to be in a condition, with God's blessing, to stop its farther progress. And as all other provisions will be altogether vain and fruitless, if the abominable practice of running goods be not at once totally suppressed, I most earnestly recommend to you, to let no other consideration stand in competition with a due care of preserving so many thousand lives.

“The several affairs which I have mentioned to you, being of the highest and most immediate concern to the whole kingdom, I doubt not but you will enter into a consideration of them with that temper, unanimity, and dispatch, that the necessity and importance of them require.”

Soon after the king communicated to both houses, a newly discovered conspiracy. Though there was no certain proof, the alarm spread with amazing rapidity, and excited, for a time, the same alarms as if the danger had been obvious, and on the point of being carried into execution. The habeas corpus act was suspended for above a whole year; and consequently the nation left, in some measure, at the discretion of the ministry. Some peers, and several private gentlemen were imprisoned; a manifesto, said to have been published by the pretender, inflamed the minds of the people. Some severe bills were passed against the catholics: and the preparations for war put the whole kingdom in agitation. To believe this conspiracy real, there is a necessity for supposing that the conspirators wanted common sense, as they were accused of applying to the regent of France, whose intimate connections with the king of England were well known. The commons, however, avowed the certainly of a plot to change the government, and place a papist on the throne. Several persons were accused; and among the rest Christopher Layer, a young counsellor of the Temple, was executed at Tyburn.

A. D. 1723. But the principal person that felt the hand of power on this occasion, was the famous Francis Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, a prelate of obscure birth, but distinguished merit, a friend to letters, and equally remarkable for his understanding and virtues. He was odious to the court, because he had not followed its principles; and odious to the whigs, because he had not followed their sentiments. Being imprisoned, he denied the jurisdiction of the house of commons, and declared he would produce his defence before the peers. The proofs against him were reduced to two letters, intercepted at the post-office, written in a very peculiar cypher, and, to all appearance, fabricated by his enemies. The commons passed a bill, whereby he was to be deprived of his office and benefice, banished the kingdom, and be guilty of felony if he returned; and that it should not be in the king's power to pardon him without the consent of parliament; but nevertheless, he should not forfeit his goods and chattels.

When this bill came before the lords, it met with a very strong opposition. The duke of Wharton, earl Cowper, and the lords Bathurst and Gower, spoke against it with great energy: they displayed the danger and injustice in departing, in so extraordinary a manner, from the fixed rules of evidence: that such a practice must for ever fully the lustre and glory of that illustrious house: that the admitting the precarious and uncertain evidence of the clerks of the post-office, was a very dangerous precedent, especially as, in this case, it was taken for granted, that those clerks might carry the similitude of hands four months in their minds. They desired to know from whom these clerks had received authority to intercept and open letters, especially those of a lord of parliament; and whether the clerks who copied these letters had themselves intercepted the originals? or whether they had received them from any other person? "If such proceedings as these (said lord Bathurst) are encouraged, we have no other part to take, but to retire into the country, and seek tranquillity and security, if we may find them by our fire-sides. The least correspondence, the least letter intercepted, may render us criminal." He insisted on the example of cardinal Mazarine, who said, "That with two lines of a man's hand-writing, added to a small number of circumstances, proved by evidence, he should be master of his life." Then turning himself towards the bishops, who shewed very little favour to their brother, he expressed his indignation against the inveterate hatred of some persons towards the bishop of Rochester; "a hatred (added he) absolutely inconceivable, unless they hold the ridiculous opinion of some savages, who believe they inherit not only the spoils, but the talents of an illustrious enemy, when they have slain him in battle." But notwithstanding these, and other powerful reasons urged against the bill, it passed by a small majority, and afterwards received the royal assent. Atterbury retired into France, where he met with repose, esteem, and all the indulgences that polished society can shew to men of superior parts.

A. D. 1724. While his majesty continued abroad, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, paid the debt of nature. This event greatly affected the king, and he hastened over to England, it being uncertain whether the new regent would entertain the same views as his predecessor; and on the ninth of January he opened the session of parliament with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot open this session without congratulating you upon the success of your endeavours last year, for the safety, interest, and honour of the kingdom. The rise of the public credit, the flourishing condition of our trade and manufactures, and the general tranquillity of my people, are the happy consequences of your prudent resolutions. It is to be hoped that the few examples which were made of some notorious offenders, will be sufficient to deter the most disaffected from engaging in the like desperate and wicked practices. The augmentation you thought fit to make to our national forces by sea and land, has not only secured the general quiet of the kingdom against any sudden attempts or insurrections, but has also given me such weight and credit in all foreign negotiations, as greatly contribute towards the preservation of the peace of Europe.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I will order the proper officers to lay before you the estimates for the service of the current year. I desire such supplies only as you shall find absolutely necessary for preserving the peace of the kingdom, and for the security of my people; and those I hope may be raised without laying any additional charge or burden on my subjects.

"I must, in a particular manner, recommend to your care the public debts of the kingdom, as the most national concern you can possibly take into your consideration. I am persuaded it must be a very great satisfaction to all my faithful subjects, to see the sinking fund improved and augmented, and the debt of the nation thereby put into a method of being so much the sooner gradually reduced and paid off. It would be a work truly worthy of a British parliament to begin this commendable undertaking, and to make such a progress therein, as, with a strict regard to public faith and private property, may pave the way to this great and desirable end.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In the present happy situation of affairs, I have nothing more to recommend to you, than that you would make use of the opportunity, which your own good conduct has put into your hands, in considering of such farther laws as may be wanting for the ease and encouragement of trade and navigation, for the employment of the poor, and for exciting and encouraging a spirit of industry in the nation.

"I am fully satisfied, that the trade and wealth of my people are the happy effects of the liberties they enjoy; and that the grandeur of the crown consists in their prosperity: and I am as fully persuaded, that all who wish well to their country, must agree with me, that it is the vainest of all delusions to imagine, that the religion, laws, and liberties of this kingdom, can ever be secured, but by supporting the present establishment, and maintaining the succession in the protestant line. Let us therefore heartily join in every thing that may tend to promote our mutual happiness, and to extinguish the hopes of those who long have been, and still are restless in their endeavours to subject this nation to the whole train of miseries that are inseparable from popery and arbitrary power."

The principal, and, indeed, almost the only debate, during this session of parliament, was in the house of lords, on the affairs of the army. During the last year, an addition of four thousand men had been made to the land forces, on account of the conspiracy; and it was now proposed to continue the same number. The commons had agreed to it, and passed the bill; but the continuance of these additional troops met with great opposition in the house of lords. The earl of Orrery, and the lords Trevor, North, Grey, and Bathurst, spoke with great force against it. They were answered by lord Townshend and the duke of Argyle. The latter observed, "That if he saw the nation unanimous in opinion, that our religion, laws, liberties and properties, entirely depend upon the present happy establishment, and on the protestant succession in his majesty's royal family, he would readily give his vote for reducing the army; but he was very much afraid that some people so strenuously insisted on disbanding the additional troops, with no other design than that of weakening weakening the government, and thereby have an opportunity of involving their native country in new troubles. And therefore those noble lords who spoke for the reduction of the army, would do well, when they went down into their several counties, to assure the people, with whom, no doubt, their reasons would not fail of having great weight, that their liberties and properties were entirely safe under his majesty's government." After a long debate, the motion for disbanding the additional troops was rejected, and the bill passed as sent up from the commons.

On the sixteenth of May, the king sent the following circular letter to the universities of Oxford and Cambridge: "We being greatly desirous to favour and encourage these ancient and laudable nurseries of piety and learning, and to enable them more effectually to answer the end of their institution, by sending forth constant supplies of learned and able men to serve the public, both in church and state; and having observed, that no encouragement or provision has hitherto been made in either of the universities for the study of modern history, or modern languages, the knowledge of which is highly necessary towards gratifying the youth committed to their care; for several stations, both in church and state; to which they may be called: and having seriously weighed the prejudice that has occurred to the universities from this defect, persons of foreign nations being often employed in the education and tuition of youth, both at home and in their travels, and great numbers of the young nobility and gentry being either sent directly abroad from schools, or taken away from the universities before the course of their studies can be there completed, and opportunities frequently lost to the crown of employing and encouraging members of the two universities, by conferring on them such employments, both at home and abroad, as necessarily require a competent skill in writing and speaking the modern languages; in order, therefore, to remedy these and the like inconveniencies, we have determined to appoint two persons of sober conversation and prudent conduct, of the degree of master of arts, or bachelor of laws, or of some higher degree, in one of the universities, skilled in modern history, and in the knowledge of modern languages, to be nominated by us to be our professors of modern history, one for the university of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford, who shall be obliged to read lectures in the public schools, at such times as shall hereafter be appointed. And we have farther determined, that each of the professors shall have a stipend of four hundred pounds per annum, and out of the stipend shall be obliged to maintain with sufficient salaries, in the university where he shall be established, two persons at least, well qualified to teach and instruct in writing and speaking the languages, which teachers shall be under the direction of the professors respectively, and shall be obliged to learn two at least of the languages, both the professors and teachers taking especial care, that the times and hours for teaching and instructing the scholars be so ordered as not to interfere with those appointed for their academical studies; which professors and teachers shall be obliged once every year to give in an attested account of the progress made by each scholar committed to their care, to our principal secretaries of state, to be laid before us, that we may encourage the diligence and application of such among them as shall have qualified themselves for our service, by giving them suitable employments, either at home or abroad, as occasion shall offer."

On the twelfth of November, his majesty opened the session of parliament with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am persuaded you share with me in the satisfaction I feel at the prosperous situation of affairs: peace with all powers abroad; and at home perfect tranquillity, plenty, and an uninterrupted enjoyment of all civil and religious rights, are most distinguishing marks of the favour and protection of the divine providence: and these, with all their happy consequences, will, I doubt not, by the blessing of God upon our joint endeavours, be long continued to my people.

"The same provision by sea and land, for the defence and safety of the nation, will continue to make us respected abroad, and, consequently, secure at home. The same attention to the improvement of the public revenues, and to the ease and encouragement of trade and navigation, will establish credit upon the strongest basis, and raise such a spirit of industry, as will not only enable us gradually to discharge the national debt, but will likewise greatly increase the wealth, power, and influence of this kingdom.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I have ordered the proper officers to prepare and lay before you estimates of the expences of the ensuing year; and as they do not exceed what has been found, by experience, to be absolutely necessary for the security of the kingdom, I make no question but I shall have your ready concurrence in raising the supplies in such a manner as shall be most easy to my people.

"There is one thing which I must mention to you as deserving your particular consideration. It is too manifest, that the funds established for finishing the works at Greenwich hospital, and providing for a competent number of seamen there, cannot, in time of peace, be sufficient to answer the expences of this great and necessary work. It is therefore very much to be wished, that some method could be found out to make a farther provision for a comfortable support to our seamen, worn out in the service of their country, and labouring under old age and infirmities.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"You must all be sensible how much our present happiness is owing to your union and steady conduct. It is therefore wholly unnecessary to recommend to you unanimity and dispatch in all your deliberations. The zeal and abilities you have on all occasions shewn in supporting the interest of your country, even under the greatest difficulties, leave me no room to doubt of my having your intire and effectual concurrence in every thing that may tend to the service of the public, and to the good of my people."

A.D. 1725. Great part of this session was taken up with the trial of Macclesfield, lord-chancellor. There had been, for some time, a murmuring against the insufficiency of the masters in chancery to answer the great sums lodged in their hands by the suitors in that court; and it was suspected that the large sums they paid for admission to their places, made it more easy than it ought to have been, and very much lessened the enquiry into their qualifications. These complaints were now risen to such a height, that Macclesfield thought proper to resign the great seal, hoping by that means to escape any enquiry into his conduct. But he was mistaken. The king, on the ninth of February, sent a message to the house of commons, requesting that some enquiry might be made into the abuses committed by the masters in chancery.

The rigour of the law cannot be better employed than in punishing those who have abused its authority; and the commons determined that those who had abused the power intrusted with them for the good of the public, should feel the whole weight of their resentment. They accordingly enquired into the complaints, and it was found that they owed their origin to the chancellor. He was therefore impeached for seizing the property of the widow and orphan; for having sold the offices in chancery at exorbitant prices; and for having given up to his favorites large sums belonging to litigating parties, that his officers might indulge his private rapacity. The trial lasted twenty days, when he was found guilty, and condemned to pay a fine of thirty thousand pounds, pounds, and to continue in prison till payment was made. If corruption thus infects the magistracy, how great must be its ravages among the body of the people? Exemplary punishments are in such cases indispensable; but unfortunately the more general the vice prevails, the less frequently the punishments take.

During this session of parliament a bill was passed to reverse the attainder of lord Bolingbroke, with respect to his forfeitures, his majesty having before granted him a pardon with respect to his life. This bill met with a strong opposition in the house of commons; but after a long debate it was passed by a considerable majority.

On the thirty-first of May the king, after giving the royal assent to the bills that were ready, and expressed his gratitude to the commons for the large supplies they had granted, prorogued the parliament. The behaviour of the lower house merited these acknowledgements: they were now as much too prodigal as they were formerly too penurious. The nation was less loaded with taxes at a time when the public complained of despotism. The king, as elector of Hanover, having interests, foreign to those of Great Britain, his policy consisted in supporting those interests at the expence of England.

The Scots, ever since the union, had unwillingly paid any of the taxes laid on the united kingdom; and had behaved, on all occasions, as if they thought themselves injured, when they were obliged to contribute any thing towards the public expence. The enemies of the government failed not to cherish this disposition in the people; and, under the mask of a pretended zeal for the old constitution, to inspire the populace with a hatred of that which was now established. The malt-tax occasioned the greatest clamour; and it was foreseen that it could not be collected without exposing the officers of the revenue to the utmost danger. At Edinburgh, indeed, the excisemen were suffered to take an account of the maltsters stock in hand; but those at Glasgow were obliged to apply to the commissioners of the excise at Edinburgh for protection and assistance, their lives being threatened if they dared to visit the malt-houses.

Alarmed at these proceedings, the commissioners applied to general Wade, commander of the forces in Scotland, who, on the twenty-third of June, sent captain Bushel, at the head of two companies of soldiers to Glasgow. On entering the town they perceived a great number of people, who saluted them with the most abusive language, and threw stones at them as they marched along the streets, crying out, No malt-tax. The officer desired them to forbear, for he meant them no harm. The provost gave him billets for quartering his men, but told him he could not put him in possession of the guard-room, the populace having locked the door and carried away the key. Unwilling to exasperate the rabble by breaking open the door, the officer ordered the guard to be kept at a public house, which he had hired for that purpose. Every thing continued quiet till about eleven at night, when several thousands of the lower class of people assembled about the house of Mr. Daniel Campbell, representative in parliament for Glasgow, and threatened it with destruction. Captain Bushel, desirous of putting an end to the tumult, before the rioters had committed any disorders, sent a message to the provost, informing him of the mischief they threatened to commit, and that he was ready to give him any assistance. The provost answered, that he thought the number of his soldiers too small to oppose the rabble, and therefore he thought it more prudent not to make use of them. Encouraged by the timidity of the magistrate they proceeded to carry their threats into execution; forced into the house, and stripped it of every thing that was portable. The magistrates took no notice of the riot; and though several of them were found next morning drunk in the house, not one of them was sent to prison. The officers of excise concealed themselves from the fury of the populace, who threatened to punish them in the most dreadful manner. About four in the afternoon the cabal began to assemble again; and captain Bushel, not knowing what their designs might be, ordered the soldiers to be ready at the guard-room, which the provost had now caused to be opened. The mob did not, however, long keep their secret, they advanced towards the guards, crying, "Drive the dogs out of town! we will cut them to pieces." The officer desired them to desist, told them they intended to do them no hurt; but if they continued to provoke the soldiers it would not be in his power to prevent their firing. This had no effect upon the rabble, they continued throwing large stones in such quantities, that some of the locks and bayonets of the soldiers were broken, and some of them wounded. The soldiers were now ordered to fire over their heads to intimidate them; but this had no effect; they continued to advance, and threw stones in still greater quantities. Exasperated at this usage, the soldiers fired among them and killed three or four. This had the desired effect; they were terrified and retired to some distance. The provost now desired captain Bushel to save himself and his men by retreating out of town, as the rioters were collecting all the arms they could find; and that a desperate engagement must otherwise soon ensue. The captain followed his advice, and marched directly for Dumbarton; but was followed several miles by the mob, and obliged to face about and fire upon them several times in order to secure his retreat.

As soon as he reached Dumbarton he dispatched a messenger to general Wade, informing him of the riot, and desiring instructions how to act for the future. The general perceived the danger, and saw the necessity of enforcing the laws. He therefore set out from Edinborough, accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord-advocate, and the next day joined a body of forces, that had been ordered to rendezvous on a moor within two miles of Glasgow, consisting of two regiments of horse, a detachment of dragoons, and about two regiments of foot. The general now informed the magistrates that he was preparing to march into Glasgow, and the next day, about two o'clock he entered the town. The troops advanced with silence and good order, and were distributed into quarters without any disturbance. The next day the excisemen proceeded to take an account of the maltsters stock in hand, and had quiet admittance. The terms of the act were complied with and every thing continued in tranquillity.

The king set out for his German dominions on the third of June, and soon after engaged in new continental engagements. The emperor, who had always been distressed for want of money, determined to have recourse to trade, and accordingly established an East India company at Ostend. This soon excited the jealousy of the maritime powers, who seemed determined to crush it in its birth. The emperor, in order to support this establishment, and maintain it against the efforts of the English monarch, to whom he had not granted the investiture of Bremen and Verden, terminated his differences with Spain. The treaty was signed at Vienna, by the duke de Ripperda, a Dutchman, who to raise his fortune, had abandoned both his religion and his country, and was appointed prime minister to Philip V. The two sovereigns gave up all pretensions to their respective properties. Philip granted to the Austrian traders, the privileges which the merchants of other foreign nations enjoyed; and undertook to guarantee the Ostend-company. He also promised an annual subsidy of four millions of piasters to the emperor. The czar of Muscovy entered into this alliance, and George was alarmed for his Hanoverian dominions. He therefore concluded, at Hanover, a defensive alliance with France and Prussia. These negotiations being finished the king set out for England about the middle of December.

A.D. 1726. As this treaty had very little concern with with England a strong opposition was expected, and every precaution taken to procure a majority in parliament, and to spread reports among the people that the emperor having concluded an alliance with Spain, was endeavouring to disturb the tranquillity of Great Britain; and that Gibraltar and Port Mahon, would be the first object of their designs. A general cry was raised against "the machinations of ill-designing people, the plots of a popish pretender, the protestant interest, the balance of power, the liberty and security of the kingdom." Political artifices calculated entirely to fascinate the nation, and induce it to sacrifice its interests to the affairs of the continent: These measures being taken, the king opened the session of parliament on the twentieth of January, with the following speech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,
 "I have had such frequent experience of the wisdom and zeal of this parliament on many important occasions, that it is with pleasure I meet you again; and I make no doubt but that your endeavours for the good and service of your country, will be as successful as they have hitherto been.

"The distressed condition of some of our protestant brethren abroad; and the negotiations and engagements entered into by some foreign powers, seem to have laid the foundation of new troubles and disturbances in Europe, and to threaten my subjects with the loss of several of the most advantageous branches of their trade, obliged me, without any loss of time, to concert with other powers such measures as might give a check to the ambitious views of those, who are endeavouring to render themselves formidable, and put a stop to the progress of such dangerous designs. For these ends I have entered into a defensive alliance with the most christian king and the king of Prussia, to which several other powers, and particularly the states-general, have been invited to accede: and I have not the least reason to doubt of their concurrence. This treaty shall, in a short time, be laid before you. By these means, and by your support and assistance, I trust in God I shall be able, not only to secure to my own subjects the enjoyment of many valuable rights and privileges, long since acquired for them by the most solemn treaties, but effectually to preserve the peace and balance of Europe, the only view and end of all my endeavours.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"I have ordered the estimate for the services of the ensuing year to be prepared and laid before you, which, from an unwillingness I always have to put my subjects to any extraordinary expence by any unnecessary precautions, are formed on the foot of employing no greater number of forces than was thought necessary the last year, for which, if the supplies you give shall be fully and effectually raised, I shall be enabled to have a strong fleet at sea early in the spring. If the posture of affairs should, at any time, make it necessary to augment our maritime force, I confide so entirely in the zeal and affection of my parliament, that I assure myself you will enable me to make such an addition to the number of seamen as shall be found requisite.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is not to be doubted, but the enemies of my government will conceive hopes, that some favourable opportunity for renewing their attempts may offer, from the prospect of new troubles and commotions. They are always very busy by their instruments and emissaries in those courts, whose measures seem most to favour their purposes, in soliciting and promoting the cause of the pretender. But I persuade myself, notwithstanding the countenance and encouragement they have received, or flatter themselves with, the provision you shall make for the safety and defence of the kingdom, will effectually secure us from any attempts from abroad, and render all such projects vain and abortive.

"When the world shall see, that you will not suffer the British crown and nation to be menaced and insulted, those, who must envy the present happiness and tranquillity of this kingdom, and are endeavouring to make us subservient to their ambition, will consider their own interest and circumstances, before they make any attempt upon so brave a people, strengthened and supported by prudent and powerful alliances, and, though desirous to preserve the peace, able and ready to defend themselves against the efforts of all aggressors. Such resolutions and such measures, timely taken, I am satisfied are the most effectual means of preventing a war, and continuing to us the blessings of peace and prosperity."

These treaties occasioned a long and very warm debate in both houses. It was said that the offensive treaty concluded with France and Prussia was contrary to the act of settlement, which admitted of no war in defence of the king's possessions in Germany. But the court interest prevailed; the treaty was approved of, extraordinary supplies were granted, and both houses promised to support his majesty, in case any attack should be made upon his foreign dominions.

On the twenty-fourth of March, Sir Paul Methuen, knight of the bath, delivered the following message from the king to the house of commons:

"His majesty having nothing more at heart than an earnest desire to secure his own subjects the full and free enjoyment of their trade and navigation, and in the best manner to prevent and frustrate such designs, as have been formed against the particular interest of this nation, and the general peace of Europe, has found it necessary not only to augment his maritime force, but to concert such other measures, as may most effectually conduce to these desirable ends: and as these services will require some extraordinary expence, his majesty hopes he shall be enabled, by the assistance of parliament, to increase the number of seamen already voted and granted for the service of this year, and to enter into, and make good such engagements, as the circumstances and exigency of affairs may require."

This message occasioned a long debate in the house of commons; but it was at last agreed to comply with, and an address was voted to his majesty, informing him that his faithful commons would support him, and had agreed to the required augmentation.

By some mistake this message had not been communicated to the house of lords, though the king mentioned his hopes of being enabled, by the assistance of his parliament, to increase the number of seamen already voted. This omission caused a very warm debate. The earl of Strafford asserted, "that the message was unprecedented, and struck at the ancient privileges of the house of peers, who are the grand standing-council of the sovereign, the hereditary and perpetual guardians of the liberties and properties of the people; and, next to the king, the principal part of the legislature; and who, therefore, have a right to be consulted in all matters of public concern." He moved, therefore, "that an address be presented to know, who advised his majesty not to send the same message to the house of peers, as was sent to the house of commons." The lord Trevor, in order to prevent disagreeable debates, moved, that the consideration of that matter might be put off for a month; but lord Lechmere represented, "that the subject was of great importance to his majesty's service, to the honour of that noble and illustrious assembly, to the ancient constitution of parliament, and to the prosperity and welfare of the kingdom; that it ought not to be postponed at all much less for such a length of time, as amounted to a laying it entirely aside. That it must be for the service and support of the crown, upon all occasions, to have the advice of both houses of parliament; and as the message was only sent to the house of commons, and there had not yet been any communication with their lordships upon it, though it contained matters of the highest importance, it tended to undermine the founda-dation of the house of peers, and of the ancient constitution of the kingdom. That the rights of the people of England were in some measure invaded, whenever they were deprived of the assistance of that house of parliament, without whom no aid can be given to the crown, nor any taxes laid upon the subjects. And therefore, if this debate should be adjourned to so long a day, it might be inferred from such a dilatory proceeding, that their lordships were not as jealous of their own privileges, and of the rights and properties of the people, at this time, and as much determined to support and defend both, as any of their ancestors and predecessors had formerly been. That it was the unbounded inherent, and fundamental right of the house of peers, to alter and amend all money bills, which came from the commons; and though, in some late instances, the commons had disputed that right, yet the lords had never failed to maintain and assert it. That according to ancient usage, all demands of supply should come from the throne in the house of peers; and therefore all other methods are unparliamentary, new, and dangerous to the constitution." He was answered by the lords Onslow and Townshend; and these were replied to by lord Bathurst, who observed, "That the appellation of parliament being given to the commons, and separately from the lords, was indeed new and unprecedented. That this was so far from being the language of former times, that though of late the commons took upon them to begin all money bills, yet there was a time when they were so inconsiderable, as to apply to the lords to desire them to provide money for the public service. That if, at this time, the lords suffered themselves to be overlooked in this manner, they might come at last to be voted useless, as they had formerly been. And therefore, lest any mistake at this time should be attended with such ill consequences, as to encourage any evil ministers hereafter, to a total neglect of the house of peers, he was of opinion, that proper notice should be taken of it immediately, instead of deferring the farther consideration of it for a month." The earl of Scarborough said, "He did not deny, that the peers have a right to be advised with in all matters of importance, and to give their consent to money-bills. But in the case before them, it seemed needless to send the message in question to the house, because their lordships had implicitly given their consent to the augmenting the number of seamen, in their address of thanks, wherein the augmentation was hinted at. As to what had been suggested, that formerly the commons applied to the lords to provide money for the public service, the reason of it was, because at that time, none had any money to give but the lords, most of the lands being then in their hands; whereas, since the reign of Henry the seventh, the case is very much altered; and therefore they ought not consider how things were formerly but how they are at present, and act accordingly." Several other speeches were made on this occasion; but the adjournment took place, and the address was afterwards rejected.

Three fleets were now fitted out, one of seven men of war, under the command of vice-admiral Hosier, and destined for the West Indies; another of twelve ships of the line, for the Mediterranean, under Sir John Jennings; and a third intended for the Baltic, consisting of twenty-one men of war, and two fire-ships, commanded by Sir Charles Wager and Sir George Walton.

Incensed to the highest degree at these proceedings, Spain made great preparations for war. A camp of about twenty thousand men was formed at St. Roche near Gibraltar, and all the necessaries for a siege were provided. Preparations were also made at sea; four thousand sailors were landed; several men of war were already at Cadiz, and ships purchased wherever they were to be sold. The pretence for these preparations, was to rebuild the castle of Old Gibraltar; but it was very visible that a blow of much greater consequence was intended.

A. D. 1727. In this situation of affairs the parliament assembled on the seventeenth of January, and the session was opened with the following speech from the throne;

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I acquainted you last year, with the treaties of peace and commerce concluded between the emperor and the king of Spain. As that sudden and unaccountable conjunction, gave, at the first appearance, just grounds of jealousy and apprehension to the neighbouring powers of Europe, and the subsequent proceedings and transactions in these two courts, and the secret and offensive alliances, concluded between them about the same time, have laid the foundations of a most exorbitant and formidable power, and are so directly levelled against the most valuable and darling interests and privileges of this nation, that we must determine either tamely to submit to the peremptory and unjust demands of the king of Spain in giving up Gibraltar, and patiently to acquiesce in the emperor's usurped and extended exercise of trade and commerce, or must resolve to be in a condition to do ourselves justice, and to defend our undoubted rights against these reciprocal engagements, entered into in defiance and violation of all national faith and the most solemn treaties.

"I have likewise received information from different parts, on which I can entirely depend, that the placing the pretender on the throne of this kingdom is one of the articles of the secret engagements: and if time shall evince, that the giving up the trade of this nation to one power, and Gibraltar and Port Mahon to another, is made the price and reward of imposing upon this kingdom a popish pretender: what an indignation must this raise in the breast of every Briton!

"Nor were these fatal combinations confined to those parts of the world alone, but they extended themselves unto Russia, and had not the designs of that court against some of their neighbours been prevented by the seasonable arrival of our fleet in those seas, a way had been opened for invading those kingdoms, and given a powerful assistance to any attempts to be made from other quarters.

"Such circumstances would not suffer me and my allies, among whom there has been, and is, the most perfect harmony, union and concert, to be idle spectators and regardless of their own safety and the common cause of Europe, for which his most Christian majesty has been at a great expence this last year, in augmenting his forces; and the states-general, sensible of the imminent danger, have not only acceded to the defensive alliance, concluded at Hanover, but have come to strong and seasonable resolutions for an extraordinary augmentation of their forces both by sea and land. The accession of the crown of Sweden is in such a forwardness, and the negotiations with the crown of Denmark are so far advanced; that we may reasonably depend upon the success and good effect of them.

"This short view of the present posture of affairs, will, I am confident not only secure to me the support and assistance of my parliament in carrying on this great and necessary work, in conjunction with my allies, but justify the measures hitherto taken, and the expences already made.

"The confidence you reposed in me last year, has been made use of for the benefit of the public; and as the chief article of exceeding, has, by my equipping and sending to sea three considerable squadrons, fallen upon the head of the navy, I am persuaded that the necessity of the services, and the security, advantage, and glory, that has accrued to this nation from these squadrons, will sufficiently speak for themselves, as long as both friends and foes, with joy and concern, confess they have seen and felt the effects of the naval power of Great-Britain.

"It

"It is not to be wondered at, that the princes engaged in these enterprises are very much disturbed to see their projects rendered abortive. The king of Spain, impatient of the disappointment he has met with, can no longer disguise that enmity to us, which, for some time, he has only waited for a favourable opportunity to declare. He has now ordered his minister residing here to depart immediately from this country, leaving a memorial that is little short of a declaration of war, wherein he again demands and insists upon the restitution of Gibraltar. He does not himself deny the offensive alliance, nor his engagements to support the Ostend company. He makes my recalling those squadrons, which his conduct has put me under the necessity of sending to the West-Indies, and the coast of Spain, the condition of any farther correspondence between the two crowns; and supposing the continuance of my fleet abroad to be actual hostilities, threatening to repel them with force to the utmost of his power.

"But not content with those menaces, insults, and infractions of treaties, his Catholic majesty is now making preparations to attack and besiege Gibraltar; and in order to carry on that service, or to cover another design, has assembled a great body of troops in that neighbourhood. But as the present state and condition of that garrison, with the reinforcements I have ordered thither, give me little cause to apprehend, or my enemies to hope for success in that undertaking, the certain and undoubted intelligence I have, that it is now resolved to attempt an invasion upon these kingdoms, in favour of the pretender, by an embarkation from the coast of Spain, gives me reason to believe, that though the siege of Gibraltar may probably be undertaken, the public avowed and immense preparations made for that purpose are chiefly calculated to amuse the world, and to disguise the intended invasion, which I am surely informed has been, for some time, agreed to be the first step, and beginning of the long-premeditated rupture.

"Gentlemen of the house of commons,

"These considerations must awaken in you all such a sense of our common and immediate danger, as will, I doubt not, inspire you with a zeal and cheerfulness in raising the supplies necessary for the defence of our country, and for making good our engagements with our allies.

"I receive too much satisfaction from the happiness of my people, in their full enjoyment and future prospect of peace, ease and prosperity, not to be sensibly affected with these new convulsions, and the unavoidable necessity I am under of asking larger supplies of my people, and of desiring to be enabled to make such an augmentation of my forces by sea and land, as the present exigency of my affairs requires.

"I will order the proper estimates to be laid before you, and such treaties as I have made with foreign princes for the hire of foreign troops: and as the expence I was last year, in a particular manner, intrusted to make, has amounted to no inconsiderable sum, and the public utility may again require the like services to be performed, I hope you will again repose the same trust and confidence in me.

"It is with great pleasure that I see the time so near approaching, when such a considerable addition will be made to the sinking-fund. Let all that wish well to the peace and quiet of my government, have the satisfaction to see, that our present necessities shall make no interruption in the progress of that desirable work of gradually discharging the national debt. I hope, therefore, you will make a provision for the immediate application of the progress of the sinking-fund to the uses for which it was so wisely contrived, and to which it stands now appropriated.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have had no thoughts of making any acquisitions to any parts of my dominions. My whole care and concern has been to preserve and maintain the undoubted rights and privileges of my people; and therefore all my measures have been preventative and defensive. But such measures being now rendered impracticable, vigorous resolutions; and a speedy execution of them, can alone put an effectual end to the dangers that surround us. However hazardous and desperate the enterprises formed against us may appear to be, your being assured of their being resolved upon, will, I am persuaded, be sufficient to prevail upon you to put yourselves in a condition to resist and defeat them.

"If preserving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the possession of the crown of Great-Britain, of infinite advantage to our trade and commerce; if supporting that trade and commerce against dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and, if the present establishment, the religion, liberties and properties of a protestant people, are any longer objects worthy the care and attention of a British parliament, I need say no more to incite my loyal and faithful houses of parliament to exert themselves in the defence of all that is dear and valuable to them."

This speech raised the zeal and indignation of the commons to such a height, that, in their address, words seemed wanting to express the deep resentment at the insults offered the king, at the invasion of the most valuable branches of trade, at the designs formed against the nation, and to applaud the wise measures taken by the king, to prevent the destructive designs formed against the liberties of Europe. They voted forty-six thousand men, together with a land-tax of four shillings in the pound.

But the upper house was less complaisant. A violent debate at first seemed to promise a powerful opposition. Lord Bathurst, after representing the inconveniences of the war, observed, that considerable sums had been distributed in different places to give success to certain measures, and recommended it to the lords to make a strict enquiry into an object of such importance. "As to myself, (said he) I have never touched either English or Spanish gold; I am neither a Frenchman nor a Spaniard, but shall always glory in being a true Englishman, and in speaking and acting for the good of my country, while I shall have the honour of being a member of this house." The measures of the king were, however, voted to be honourable, just, and necessary.

Nor was the house of lords the only place where the king's speech was examined. The court of Vienna was highly offended, and passed severe censures upon it. The count de Palmis, ambassador from the emperor, had orders to present and publish a remonstrance, wherein the king of England was charged with giving an imperfect, mutilated, or very groundless account of facts. It was insisted, that the article respecting the pretender was false; that there was no offensive alliance between the emperor and Spain; that the treaty of Vienna was no infringement of the lawful rights of England; and lastly, reparation for the injury done to his imperial majesty by these calumnious imputations was required.

This memorial was highly resented by the parliament. Both houses joined in an address, expressing their indignation at the affront offered to his majesty by the memorial of the count de Palmis, and at his insolence in dispersing the same throughout the kingdom; assuring his majesty, that this audacious manner of appealing to the people, and turning a memorial into a seditious libel, was a proceeding that created in them the utmost abhorrence and detestation.

"The endeavouring," said they in their address, "to instill into the minds of any of your faithful subjects the least distrust or diffidence of your majesty's sacred royal word, or to make a distinction between your majesty and your people, is an attempt as vain as presumptuous. If time has not effaced the memory memory of the glorious exploits; and important succours (confessed to have been received from Great-Britain) gratitude, affection, and esteem for this nation; will be best manifested, by doing honour to the king, whom the people honour; and justice to the people, whose rights and privileges the best of kings is now defending, against the encroachments made upon them."

The secretary of state wrote a letter to the count de Palm, ordering him to quit the kingdom immediately. The two powers attacked each other at the imperial diet, by writings replete with personal animosities. Nothing less than a violent and obstinate war was expected. The king entered into new negotiations with France, Sweden, Denmark, and the prince of Hesse-Cassel. Support was also procured in Germany, but not without being attended with a vast expence to England.

It was now determined by the ministry to obtain, if possible, a power to dispose of the supplies. Accordingly a motion was made in the house of commons, by Mr. Scroope, secretary to the treasury, for empowering the king to apply such monies as he might find necessary to defray expences, and fulfil such engagements as already were, or might be contracted before the end of the year. This motion occasioned a long and very warm debate. It was said by the ministerial party, "That his majesty was so unwilling to put his subjects to any extraordinary expences, that he had demanded no more supplies this session than what he thought absolutely necessary for the service of the year. But, in the present posture of affairs, some unforeseen accidents might require a farther expence, for which no estimate could now be made, because some treaties his majesty had thought proper to enter into, were not yet finished; and therefore, that the parliament ought to enable him to answer such contingencies: that the house had several times reposed the same confidence in him, which he had never abused, especially as it was now asked only for a short time." To this it was answered, "That the wisdom of parliament had always taken precautions against the improper employment of the public money; that a power so unlimited, and of such dangerous consequence, could not be admitted under a free government; that it was essential to the welfare of the state, to preserve the forms of parliament, to grant supplies upon estimates, and to apply the monies granted to the purposes publicly avowed and acknowledged as necessary: in short, that if parliament should dispense with established customs and principles, such examples would become frequent, the crown would acquire an absolute power of levying taxes, and the constitution of England would soon be annihilated." But notwithstanding these reasons, the court party prevailed, and the bill passed both houses by a considerable majority.

In the mean time, the Spaniards laid siege to Gibraltar with an army of twenty thousand men, well provided with artillery, ammunition, and warlike stores. Colonel Clayton, lieutenant-governor of the place, had troops and necessaries sufficient for making a brave defence, till supplies could arrive from England, for which preparations had been made. But there was little to be feared from the attempts of the Spaniards; their measures were ill planned, and worse executed: so that, after lying four months before the place, and losing half their army by slaughter, sickness, and desertion, they were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

The hostile powers, notwithstanding their resentment, had not that passion for war which prolongs the miseries of mankind. France effectually employed her mediation to restore the tranquillity of Europe. Preliminaries were signed, whereby it was agreed, that hostilities should immediately cease; that the Ostend company should be suspended for seven years; and that a congress should be held within that period, for finally determining all differences.

During the last two years, the king had not visited his German dominions. He therefore prepared for his journey to Hanover soon after the breaking up of the parliament. On the seventh of June, he landed at Vaert, in Holland, and the next day proceeded on his journey. But on the tenth, about nine in the morning, he was seized in his coach with a kind of apoplectic fit, and died at Osnaburg on the eleventh, in the sixty-eighth year of his, and the thirteenth of his reign.

George I. was endowed with great qualities, a considerable capacity, discernment, policy, and a talent for negotiation. He was an enemy to parade, grave in his conduct, but not wholly susceptible of pleasure. That reputation for wisdom which he enjoyed before he came to the throne, was tarnished by a government inconsistent with the principles and interests of the nation. Possibly the counsels of his ministers carried him farther in this respect than he would himself have gone; but, indeed, the desire of extending their authority is common and natural to princes. By making himself master of the parliament, he lost the affections of the people, the greatest treasure a prince can possess. He was of a very generous disposition; and the serenity and benignity of his disposition were sufficiently displayed in his countenance.

He married the princess Sophia-Dorothy, daughter and heiress to the duke of Zell, by whom he had one son, who succeeded him in the throne; and a daughter, married to the late king of Prussia.

G E O R G E II.

A.D. 1727. AFFAIRS on the continent were in a critical, though not dangerous situation, when George II. ascended the throne. The nation was, however, in a very flourishing condition. Commerce, the great idol of the English, was every day improving, and riches flowed in from every quarter. The navy was on a very respectable footing; near two hundred ships of war were either cruising in different parts, or ready to sail, on the shortest warning, to protect our trade, or annoy the enemy. Several regiments of well-disciplined troops were quartered in different parts of the three kingdoms, so as to over-awe the disaffected; and secure the peace and tranquillity of the whole; while they strengthened the hands of government, and gave the new sovereign an ascendancy, which had been unknown to his predecessors on the English throne for many years.

The parliament met on the twenty-seventh of June, and the session was opened with a speech from the throne, in which his majesty declared, that the happiness and welfare of his people, their rights, privileges and possessions, should be his greatest care. It, however, appeared, that his plan of government, with regard to foreign affairs, was the same with that of his father; and that he was resolved to adhere to the engagements the late king had entered into by the treaty of Hanover, which, he told his parliament, had been attended with such good effects, that he hoped soon to reduce the expence of the public.

After presenting their address of condolence and congratulation, the commons proceeded to settle the civil list; and voted, "that the entire revenues of the civil list, which produced about one hundred and thirty thousand pounds a year; above the yearly sum of seven hundred thousand pounds enjoyed by the late king, should be settled on his majesty during his life." They also voted, "that one hundred thousand pounds a year should be settled on the queen during her life, in case she should survive his majesty; together with the palace of Somerset-house, and the lodge and lands at Richmond Old-park."

Bills on these resolutions being passed, the king came to the house of peers, and put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, in which he thanked the commons for the provisions they had made for the support of his family and the civil government, and for the ample provision they had made for the queen. Then addressing himself to both houses, he added, "It is a great happiness to me to see the nation in so prosperous and flourishing a condition, at the highest pitch of glory and reputation, of great weight in holding the balance of Europe, defending themselves in their just privileges and possessions; and vindicating the honour of the crown of Great-Britain."

At the close of this speech, the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ninth of August; but before that time, it was dissolved by proclamation; and writs issued for chusing a new one. On the eleventh of October, the coronation was performed at Westminster with great magnificence, and peace and tranquillity reigned in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1728. The new parliament met at Westminster on the twenty-third of January, when Arthur Onslow, Esq; was chosen speaker, with an unanimity which could only be inspired by that opinion of his virtues and abilities, which his conduct afterwards so fully justified in a longer series of public and irreprehensible services in that station, than any other man ever discharged. The speech with which his majesty opened the first session of this parliament, breathed an air of frankness and sincerity. He informed them, that he had a probability of success in restoring the tranquillity of Europe. "I am very sensible," continued he, "of the disagreeable and uneasy situation in which our affairs have been for some time, and have been extremely concerned to see many of the inconveniencies of a war attending us, without any opportunity of resenting the injuries sustained, or gaining any of those advantages in return, which the vigorous prosecution of so just a cause, and the success of our arms, might probably have secured to us." He next proceeded to inform them of the difficulties that had arisen in the execution of the preliminaries; and, "that though there was great reason to believe that the congress would soon open, and all difficulties be removed; yet, that it was absolutely necessary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general war in Europe, and had given the English nation advantages which would be lost if their military measures were discontinued." After expressing his readiness to lend all the assistance in his power for reducing the national debt, as soon as the interest of his people would permit, he recommended to their consideration the increase and encouragement of our seamen in general, that they may be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the service of their country; a consideration worthy of the representatives of a people great and flourishing in trade and commerce. He also recommended to them the care of increasing the fund for Greenwich hospital; and concluded with recommending unanimity, zeal, and dispatch. "This," said he, "will convince the world, that none of you are capable, out of any views or considerations whatsoever, to wish the distress of their country, or to give an occasion, from the prospect of difficulties that may arise, and be fomented here at home, to interrupt or disappoint our present promising expectation."

This speech produced the desired effect: the commons voted fifteen thousand seamen for the service of the current year; and twenty-two thousand, nine hundred and fifty-five land forces, being about three thousand six hundred less than the preceding year. The last vote was not, however, carried without a warm debate, on the general topics of saving to the nation; the danger of the constitution from a numerous standing army; and the little effect which the augmentation of troops raised last year produced, or was likely to produce, in favour of Great-Britain; and which ought therefore now to be reduced.

The opposition were not, however, discouraged at the large majority that divided against them on the last question. The very circumstance, that of the duration of the minister's power, which, in any other country, would have irretrievably ruined their hopes, tended only to encourage them to believe, that it would at last effect his removal, if not his ruin. They were persuaded that his influence, which, in matters of government, now seemed to be so decisive; instead of being his security, must, in the end, prove his destruction. They were not mistaken; but the great abilities of Sir Robert Walpole long baffled all their attempts.

The next considerable debate during this session, was occasioned by the Hessian troops in British pay. The sum amounted to two hundred thirty thousand, nine hundred and thirty-three pounds, for twelve thousand men, horse, dragoons, and foot. These troops had been engaged by the earnest request of the late king, and to answer the ends of the treaty of Hanover. This was explained by Mr. Horatio Walpole, the minister's brother, who said, that the tranquillity of Europe being still precarious, the original reason which had been approved by the parliament for taking these troops into British pay, still subsisted. He was answered by Sir William Wyndham, who endeavoured to shew, "that the demand was preposterous, because, by the treaty of Hanover, the contracting parties were to furnish their contingencies either in troops, shipping, or money, within two months after demand made by the party attacked." To this it was replied, "that though the treaty did leave it in the option of the party called upon, not to furnish his contingencies sooner than two months after requisition; yet, the state of affairs in Europe rendered it prudent for his late majesty to have in readiness, at all events, the troops stipulated, which were cheaper to the nation, and more convenient for the common cause, than any British forces that could be employed: that the differences which, since the signing of the treaty of Hanover, had arisen between the courts of Great-Britain and Prussia, (one of the three principal contracting parties in the treaty of Hanover) having occasioned a material and unforeseen disappointment in the carrying the purposes of that treaty into execution, the reason for hiring and continuing the Hessian troops in British pay, became indispensable: that experience had evinced the method to be wise and proper, because it had preserved the tranquillity of Germany, an object highly meriting the attention of the British nation; and that, upon the whole, not only prudence, but necessity, required it should be continued till the event of the approaching congress at Cambray should be known."

It was easily seen, from the very beginning of the debate, that the question would be carried by the ministry; but the opposition, probably for no other reason than that of knowing the strength of their party, called for a division, when it appeared that two hundred and eighty were for the question, and eighty-four against it.

Extraordinary supplies being necessary for the service of the current year, a proposition, in consequence of a motion in the house of commons, was made by the lords of the treasury, to the directors of the bank. This proposal was, that the bank might advance one million, seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds, for the purchase of seventy thousand pounds per annum of the duty upon coals, to be converted into annuities; and that the bank be empowered to sell or dispose of those annuities, at such times and in such proportions as they should judge proper; and that the sinking fund should be applied to pay off one million at the bank.

The directors of the bank very readily agreed to the proposal; but the city of London thought proper to present a petition to the house of commons, with regard to the coal-tax. They represented, that the duties already laid on coals and culm, brought into the port of London only, considerably affected their trade; and that the inequality of that burden was a great discouragement to the manufactures, as well as a great hardship upon the whole trading people in and about the city of London. They therefore prayed the house to take these reasons into consideration, and grant them such relief as they should think meet. This petition was supported by the anti-ministerial party, but was rejected by a great majority.

The increase of the national expences, however, gave the opposition great advantages. They published a state of the national debt, and attempted to prove that they were absolutely increased since the establishment of the sinking fund, which was intended solely to reduce them. When the loan by the bank came to be debated, Mr. William Pultney spoke very warmly on that subject: he called the shifting of funds a perpetuating of taxes, and putting off the evil day; insisting upon it, that the sinking fund was nothing more than a pompous project, which, since its establishment, had swelled the national debt. Sir Nathaniel Gould, a very eminent merchant, said, if he understood any thing, it was numbers; and he durst pawn his reputation to prove, that the calculations made use of by the authors of the state of the national debt were erroneous, and therefore not to be depended upon. Mr. Pultney was equally positive that the calculations in that book were just. But this being only a matter of opinion, Sir Robert Walpole attempted to justify what the merchant had advanced, and the dispute was in danger of becoming personal, when Mr. Hungerford, a member remarkable for jocularly, interposed, and prevented it from having any farther consequences.

On the twenty-sixth of February, the whole supply, amounting to near four millions, was voted; and the particulars of the distribution of the money granted last year had been laid before them. But in this account two hundred and fifty thousand pounds not being particularly specified, they addressed his majesty for a particular and distinct account of that sum. In answer to this address, Sir Paul Methuen, by his majesty's command, acquainted the house, "That the late king, his majesty's royal father, having, on the like occasion, received from the last parliament the most dutiful acknowledgments of his great care and wisdom, in taking such steps, and entering into such engagements as he thought would best conduce to the security of this kingdom and the preservation of the peace of Europe; and, at the same time, the strongest assurance of their future support in all such farther measures as he should find necessary and expedient for preventing a rupture, and for the honour and advantage of these kingdoms: and a power being accordingly given by parliament to his late majesty, for issuing and applying such sums of money as he should find necessary, for answering and defraying such expences and engagements as had been, or should be made for these great and necessary purposes; some part of the money mentioned in this address had been issued and disbursed by his late majesty; and the remaining part had been applied by his majesty for carrying on the same necessary services, for strengthening his alliances, and in fulfilling engagements of the utmost importance to these kingdoms, and to the general tranquillity of Europe; and which require the greatest secrecy. His majesty therefore hopes, that this house will repose the same confidence in him, and be assured that the money has been necessarily expended, pursuant to the power given by act of parliament, and for the uses and purposes therein directed; and that a particular account thereof cannot be given, without manifest prejudice to the public."

This answer, it must be acknowledged, was far from being conformable to the constitution of parliament, though it was not without a precedent. The opposition would not slip so fair an advantage; they attacked the ministry with all the power of reason and eloquence. They represented, that the answer was unparliamentary; that if such were accepted, the parliament must give up their most valuable privileges, those of enquiring into the disposal of public money, and the conduct of corrupted and corrupting ministers, to those very ministers who ought to be the objects of their censure." It was added, "That the answer was vague and frivolous, and might be made with equal propriety upon all occasions of enquiry into the disposal of public money." On the other hand, it was urged, "That this answer was conformable to an answer returned in the late reign, upon a similar address; that there was no more reason for distrusting his present majesty, than there was for distrusting his father; and the house of commons was so well satisfied on that occasion, that instead of expressing any symptoms of dissatisfaction, they had returned the crown an address of thanks for that answer." Sir Robert Walpole added, "That it was impossible the public service, alluded to, considering the various complication of interests on the continent, could be carried on if every shilling expended for the interest of the common cause, and for maintaining the balance of Europe, was known to all the world." These reasons appeared satisfactory; for, on the question's being put, it was carried by a majority of two hundred and two against sixty-six.

The Spanish depredations in the West-Indies had long raised an universal clamour in the nation; and negotiations had, for some time, been carrying on with that court, for putting an end to these disputes. After many difficulties, a treaty was concluded at Seville on the ninth of November; by the fourth article of which, the commerce of the English and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, are to be restored to their former footing, and orders are to be immediately dispatched by all parties for that purpose. By the fifth, his Catholic majesty engages to make reparation for all damages that had been done by his subjects to the other contracting powers. By the sixth, commissaries are to be nominated, with sufficient powers, on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majesties, who shall assemble at the court of Spain, within the space of four months, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, to examine and decide what concerns the ships and effects taken at sea on either side, to the time specified in the preceding article. The said commissaries are also to examine and decide the respective pretensions relating to the abuses that are supposed to have been committed in commerce, both in the Indies and Europe, and all the other pretensions in America, founded on treaties, whether relating to the limits, or otherwise. And the said commissaries, after having examined, discussed and decided, shall make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majesties, who promise, that within the space of six months after making the said report, they will cause to be executed, punctually and exactly, what shall have been so decided by the said commissaries.

A. D. 1729. The parliament met on the thirteenth of January, and the session was opened with a speech from the throne, in which his majesty congratulated his people on having concluded an absolute peace with Spain, and thereby preventing the miseries and confusions of war. He assured them, "that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to make the stipulations of the quadruple alliance more effectual; and that sufficient provision had been made for the indemnification and future security of the trading interest; and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction, both of the army and the fleet. He recommended to their serious attention the state of public credit, and the hardships of poor artificers and manufacturers.

The commons were no sooner returned to their house, than Sir Robert Walpole laid before them the treaty of Seville; and one of his friends moved for a particular and loyal address to the throne, almost in the very words of the speech. This motion was opposed by the country party, who were for saying no more than "to assure his majesty of the steady and zealous attachment of the house to his royal person, government, and family; and that the house would effectually support his majesty in all measures necessary for the honour and dignity of his crown, and the interests and welfare of his people."

In support of this alteration and omission, many severe things were said of the treaty, which had been published some time. Sir John Hind Cotton said, that the ministry had imposed upon his majesty in calling the peace an absolute one, because the most important interests of Great-Britain were left to a future discussion. On the contrary, the minister maintained, that the peace was absolute, and that no difference could happen in the execution of it, unless the Spaniards and other powers were encouraged to raise them by the dissension that might happen at home. Several other speeches were made on both sides, but the motion for the omission was rejected by a great majority.

The debates in the house of lords, when the treaty of Seville came before them, were of great importance, and carried to a considerable length. It was urged, that his Imperial majesty would certainly detach himself from a people whose ministers had concluded a treaty so essentially different from the quadruple alliance. To this it was replied, that there never was, nor could be, any essential difference, if the emperor was sincerely resolved to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance with regard to the eventual succession to the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia; and that introducing Spanish, instead of neutral troops, into the garrisons of these dominions, could make no material difference, especially as the treaty had, in the strongest manner, stipulated, that the troops should be withdrawn as soon as the succession to these duchies, which was a principal object of the quadruple alliance, should be secured. It was farther urged, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in question, and the quadruple alliance; yet the preservation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining satisfaction and security to our commerce, were considerations that ought infinitely to outweigh any apprehension from a resentment that could be founded only upon pride and ambition.

Great exceptions were also taken by the lords in the opposition at the sixth article, whereby the merchants, and others, who had suffered greatly by the Spanish depredations, were obliged to repair to the court of Spain, in order to make proof of their losses. This was represented as not only a discouragement to the sufferers, but derogatory to the honour of the nation. This was, however, considered as an unreasonable objection, since it was necessary for the merchants to apply where only they could have redress. The commissaries were to meet at the court of Spain; they could not properly meet elsewhere, because the validity or invalidity of the captures complained of must be discussed in those courts where the proofs remained; and the law of nations establishes the sentence of the court of admiralty of that nation where the capture is made, and to be final in all cases, and in all parts. Had the Spaniards been the complainants, the causes must have been tried in Great-Britain.

After a very tedious debate, objections being made to almost every article, the treaty was approved by a very considerable majority. It must, indeed, be acknowledged, that the ministry, in concluding it, were chiefly desirous of preserving the public tranquillity, by which England was every day making immense acquisitions of wealth, and improvements in commerce. But this was totally destructive of the views of the opposition, who well knew that the power of the ministry could only be shaken in a time of war and commotion. On the other hand, the ministry treated the opposition they met with too superciliously within doors, and too incautiously without. Secure of their own numbers in the house of commons, and persuaded that the opposition proceeded only from views of interest and ambition, they did not enter into that length and solemnity of debate that was necessary either for the conviction or conversion of the few who opposed their measures from principle only. They carried their measures rather by dividing than debating. Many noblemen and gentlemen of independent fortunes were provoked at this method of proceeding, and resented it by voting against the ministry. This gave the public such unfavourable impressions of his majesty's measures, that nothing either spoken or wrote on the side of the ministry had a fair hearing.

A most excellent act was passed this session for the better regulation of juries. Before this time, it was a reproach to the English law, that no provision was made to oblige men of substance to serve on juries; for which reason it was very common for persons of property to throw the burden from themselves on men of indigent circumstances; and this opened a way for corruption in the most capital cases.

Another act was passed this session for granting liberty to carry off from his majesty's province of Carolina, in America, directly to any part of Europe southward of Cape Finisterre, in ships built in, and belonging to Great-Britain, and navigated according to law.

By this act, a general principle that had been established by all the nations in Europe who had dominions in America, was broken through. It had hitherto been a maxim with every country, to preserve all intercourse with their plantations entire to their mother country; by which incredible advantages accrued to them in commerce and navigation. For this reason no commodities were to be exported from the English plantations, but in ships that first touched at England. But rice being a perishable commodity, this act exempted it from the general rule; provided the ship that carried it belonged to Great-Britain, and was navigated by British sailors. This act has proved very advantageous to that colony.

A great remissness of government prevailed at this time in England. Peace, both at home and abroad, continued to be the great object of the minister. Prosperity in commerce introduced luxury; hence necessities were created, and these drove the lower class of people into the most abandoned wickedness. Averse to all penal and sanguinary measures, the minister gave not that encouragement to the ordinary magistrates that could enable them to give an effectual check to vice among the multitude. This produced a very pernicious effect among the higher class; so that an almost universal degeneracy of manners prevailed. It was not safe to travel the roads, or walk the streets; and often the civil officers themselves dared neither to repel the violences, nor punish the crimes that were committed. A species of villain's now started up, unknown to former times, who made it their business to write letters to men of substance, threatening to set fire to their houses, in case they refused their demands; and sometimes their threats were carried into execution.

A. D. 1730. In the midst of these domestic disorders, the parliament met on the twenty-first of January. It was generally supposed that the obstinacy of the emperor would occasion a war, he having given orders for a large body of troops to march into Italy, to oppose the introduction of Spanish garrisons, stipulated by that treaty. The king hinted at this in his speech, at the opening of the session; and almost the whole of his speech consisted of earnest exhortations to his parliament, to enable him to be ready to carry the treaty into execution by arms, if force should be found necessary.

On the return of the commons to their house, a very loyal address, in answer to the speech, was moved for by Mr. Campbell; but the opposite party made a motion, that all the complimentary part of it should be left out, and only promise to concur with such means as should be absolutely necessary to procure the satisfaction due to the allies, and provide for the interests of the people; and then to insert the following words: "assuring ourselves, that his majesty will take effectual care to prevent the breaking out of war upon the Rhine, or in the Austrian Netherlands; the preservation of which, in the hands they now are, is of the greatest importance to these kingdoms, and the maintenance whereof has cost the nation so much blood and treasure."

The chief speakers, in support of this motion, were Sir William Wyndham, and Messrs. Daniel and William Pultney, who enjoyed the infinite advantage of having on their side all the popular topics, which experience has since evinced, in many cases, to have been mere sounds; and yet, at that time, were of such force, that the court party durst not dispute them. The power of France, was represented as threatening the liberties, both of England and of Europe. Evidence was again offered to be produced of their having cleared and repaired the harbour of Dunkirk, contrary to the treaty of Utrecht. Great complaints were made of their encroachments upon us in the West-Indies; and all was ascribed to the pernicious connections we had lately run into with them. It was farther represented, that, for England to join with France in any attempts against the emperor, either in Flanders, or upon the Rhine, would be acting against the most established maxims of the late glorious confederacy, that had humbled the power of France under the duke of Marlborough; and that it would undo the balance of power, which had been so happily established, and was the chief acquisition which England or Europe had obtained by that confederacy. Some observations were likewise made on the danger and inexpediency of the house promising indiscriminately the first day of the session, to support all his majesty's measures and engagements, before they knew what they were; and that, in fact, such an assurance rendered all their future deliberations, for that session, useless and inconsistent.

These arguments pressed hard upon several in the house, particularly Sir Robert Walpole and his brother, lord Hervey, and Sir William Young. Being professed whigs, they could not, with consistency, deny, that it would be very dangerous for public liberty, should England co-operate with the French upon the Rhine, or in Flanders, against the emperor; and yet nothing could be more plain, than that the amendment proposed was impolitic in itself, and disrespectful to his majesty. In the course of the debate, they publicly declared their sentiments on this head; observing, "that if the amendment was agreed to, it would be attended by the worst of consequences, both at home and abroad, and appear as if his majesty had intended any thing that was not absolutely necessary for the interest of England, and strictly agreeable to the principles of public liberty: that such an insinuation could only tend to discourage the friends of the protestant succession at home, and animate their enemies abroad; and therefore they ought to trust to his majesty's wonted prudence; and, that the putting such words in the address would look like an encroachment upon the prerogative of the crown, and directing the operations of the future war." Lord Hervey observed, "that the house of Austria, as well as the house of Bourbon, might, by its ambition, destroy that balance of power, so justly dear to England: that as the conduct of the French court upon the continent could give no just umbrage, the destroying the house of Bourbon, only to enable the house of Austria to rise on its ruins, was highly absurd: that he did not doubt but his majesty had sufficient interest with his allies, to concert measures which would prevent every bad consequence apprehended: and, that to agree to the proposed alteration, would be making proclamation to all Europe, that the emperor might act as he pleased, since he was invulnerable at present in Italy, by the situation of his dominions, and the great number of troops he had there: if, therefore, the allies should agree, that he was not to be attacked on the Rhine, or in the Netherlands, his majesty and his allies had nothing to do, but meekly submit to laws imposed by the court of Vienna."

These arguments being admitted by the house, and the proposed alteration on the point of being rejected, one of the members moved, that it should be inserted in the address, "that they would support his majesty's engagements, so far as they related to the interests of Great-Britain." But this amendment being subject to the very same, if not greater objections than the former, they were both rejected, and the address, as moved for, was voted without any division.

An amendment, in almost the same terms as in the lower house, was moved for, by lord Carteret, in the house of peers; but being opposed by the dukes of Newcastle and Argyle, it was over-ruled.

The rejection of the pension-bill, during the last session, having caused a great ferment in the nation, the opposition resolved to bring it again on the carpet. The motion was introduced with great solemnity; and after passing, with very little opposition, through the house of commons, was sent to the house of peers, where it was thrown out. A remarkable speech was made on this occasion by the bishop of Bangor; wherein he plainly proved, that, under the mask of popularity, this motion concealed the most dangerous tendency; and concludes in the following words: "Though this bill, at first sight, seems to be a self-denying bill, and to some particular members, may, perhaps, prove so; yet the commons, considered as an house of parliament, will find in it, no doubt, a great enlargement of power; and whatever tends to break the balance between the powers, essential to this constitution, must, sooner or later, prove the ruin of the whole. An independent house of commons, or an independent house of lords, is as inconsistent with our constitution, as an independent, that is, an absolute king; and whoever loves the liberties and laws of his country, will no more desire to see the one than the other. Let bribery be punished; let corruption be punished; but not by giving so much strength to one power of this constitution, as shall make it able to overbear the rest."

The opposition did not fail to represent this speech in the most heinous light. They caused it to be circulated throughout the kingdom, with their own notes and commentaries upon it; wherein they endeavoured to prove, that his lordship only expressed the sentiments of the minister, who had formed a design of subverting the constitution, by destroying the independency of the two houses of parliament.

The facility with which every question was carried by the ministerial party, was imputed, by the minority, to the remissness of their friends, in not attending the house; and having no compulsive power over them, they endeavoured to obtain one by the following method. A call of the house being ordered and held, two members, who were considered of the country party, were, by their friends, moved to be taken taken into custody for non-attendance; but, on the interposition of the court party, they were held excused; which serving as a precedent, the same lenity was extended to such as could plead excuses of indisposition, being on the road, or any other trivial cause. The majority, however, having afterwards taken this affair into consideration, found that they had treated it with too little attention; and agreed, that certain days should be appointed for the defaulters to attend; and, in case of disobedience of these orders, they were to be taken into custody by the serjeant at arms.

The real motive for this preparation on the part of the minority, was to strengthen a second attack they meditated upon the establishment of the Hessians in British pay: for, after the house had been furnished with all necessary papers, a motion was made for referring the estimate of the twelve thousand Hessian troops in the pay of Great-Britain, to the committee of supply. This motion occasioned a very warm debate. Mr. Daniel Pulteney observed, "that wars had happened on the continent of Europe, of which, though foreign to the interests of England, she had borne the expence." In reply to this, it was urged, "that commerce had connected England with the continent, though nature had disjoined her from it: that the English, by their influence on the affairs of the continent, had acquired many advantages in trade; and in order to maintain these, they were sometimes obliged to interfere in foreign quarrels: that some of the countries of Europe, which consumed a great number of English commodities, had so little communication with the sea, that they were inaccessible to our fleets; and therefore, if they laid the trade of the English under any hardships or inconveniences, or offered them any insults or indignities, the English had no other means of asserting their rights, or recovering their wrongs, than by employing some of the powerful states upon the continent to support their resentment: that this had frequently been found a very useful expedient to England; but that she could not any longer avail herself of it, than while she, in her turn, was ready to perform as friendly offices for those states. They asserted, that it was upon this very principle that the treaty of Hanover was concluded, and the Hessian troops were taken into British pay; and that those two measures had prevented the fatal effects which might have attended the ambition and obstinacy of the emperor: that upon the same principle likewise was founded the treaty of Seville; which, by our engaging for the introduction of six thousand Spanish troops into Italy, had effectually detached Spain from the emperor: that the latter, however, had filled Italy with his armies, in order to prevent the introduction of those garrisons. It was also observed, that the Hessians, who were in British pay, were the only curbs the emperor had in Germany; consequently, that the dismissal of these forces would leave him at liberty to kindle a flame in Europe, which might cost Great-Britain many millions to extinguish.

These were the principal arguments made use of during the course of this debate, and by which the parliament was determined to continue the establishment of the Hessian troops. Arguments to the same purport were urged when the subsidy to the duke of Wolfenbuttle was brought upon the carpet. The minority affected to treat that prince with great contempt for his insignificance and indigence; and in order to protract the time, and expose the measure as much as possible, a motion was made, and agreed to, for reading the third section of an act passed in the reign of William III. for the further limitation of the crown; which says, "In case the crown shall come to any person, not being a native of England, this nation shall not be obliged to go to war for defence of dominions not belonging to this crown." They likewise addressed for all the papers and treaties relative to the subsidy; but the same being referred to a committee of the whole house, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-four against one hundred and twelve, the question passed in the affirmative; and the prince's subsidy was continued.

The minority now supposing themselves more considerable than ever, and knowing; that since the resignation of lord Townshend, the management of foreign affairs had created public murmurs against the minister, resolved to distress him as much as possible on that subject, by making motions; which, if carried in the negative, would heighten the ill impressions already conceived of him. They accordingly addressed for all the papers relative to the treaty of Seville; for an account of the progress of the commissaries appointed by his majesty and the king of Spain in consequence of that treaty, for adjusting the demands and reparations due to the merchants of Great-Britain. The establishment of a civil government at Gibraltar had been long a favourite point with the people; but being attended with great difficulties, it had not yet been put in execution: they therefore carried an address for an account of all the proceedings that had been had on that account, and for declaring Gibraltar a free port, since the last application of the house to his majesty on that head. Another cause for an address, and which appeared too plausible to be refused, was the non-compliance of the Spaniards with the treaty of Seville in commercial points, and their continuing in a manner to block up Gibraltar. This address was for copies of such representations as his majesty had received from the governor of Gibraltar, and from his majesty's minister at the court of Spain, in relation to any works carried on at Gibraltar by the Spaniards since the conclusion of the treaty of Seville; together with such orders as had been given thereupon. All these papers were accordingly laid before the house, but very little use seems to have been made of them, except furnishing the heads of the party with materials for pamphlet-writing, which now raged in England to an excessive height.

The disputes which had happened in the execution of the treaty of Seville, by the haughtiness and obstinacy of the court of Spain, threw Europe, at this juncture, into a very extraordinary situation. The emperor alledged, that the treaty was an encroachment upon him, as head of the empire; and that Don Carlos ought to have been introduced into Italy, and the succession of the dominions there secured to him, by his receiving the investiture of them from the emperor; and by the consent of the empire; both which were ready to be granted when demanded. He also asserted, that the succession of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, was not the ultimate view of the court of Spain. In the beginning of this year, the duke of Parma died suddenly, and the imperial troops took immediate possession of his dominions; but the dutchess of Parma, in order to retard the succession of Don Carlos, was prevailed on to declare herself with child; upon which the imperialists publicly avowed, that they had taken possession of the dutchies under the auspices of the emperor, in the name of the infant Don Carlos, the heir, provided he did not come armed, but in a pacific manner; and a salvo was included for the issue of the pregnant dutchess, if it should prove a male.

The court of Spain was immediately informed, by her emissaries, of this transaction, and likewise that a negotiation was far advanced between the courts of Vienna and London; whereby it was agreed; that the contracting parties in the treaty of Seville should guaranty the pragmatic sanction, by which the emperor's female issue was to succeed to his hereditary dominions. This intelligence, added to the commercial disputes which still subsisted between the courts of Great-Britain and Spain; so greatly exasperated the latter, that the marquis de Castelar, the Spanish ambassador at Paris, signed a declaration to the ministers of the allies of the treaty of Seville, in the name of the king, his master, importing, "that his Catholic majesty looked upon himself as entirely free from the obligations of the said treaty."

On the sixteenth day of March, a treaty was actually signed between his Britannic majesty and the emperor, consisting of nine articles. By the first, a mutual guaranty of all the territories belonging to the contracting powers is stipulated. The second stipulates a general guaranty of the pragmatic sanction in favour of the emperor's female heirs. By the third, his imperial majesty consents to the introduction of the Spanish troops into the dutchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia; and binds himself to use his utmost endeavours to obtain the consent of the empire for that purpose. By the fourth, it is stipulated, that all parts of the treaty shall be duly and truly executed. The fifth entirely abolishes all navigation to the Austrian Netherlands, excepting the sending, once only, two ships from Ostend; and, by the same article, commissioners are to meet, on the part of both powers, at Antwerp, for settling a tariff between Great-Britain and the Austrian Netherlands. By the sixth, it is agreed, that all points of difference among the contracting powers, or any of their allies, should be amicably adjusted; and that the present treaty is not to derogate from the force of any of the former treaties subsisting between either the contracting parties, or their allies, excepting so far as they are inconsistent with the present treaty. By the seventh, the English, touching their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, are to be treated on the same footing as they were in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, and as it is usual to treat a nation with which one is in strict friendship. The eighth fixes eight months after the ratification for the accession of the other powers who shall be invited into the treaty: and the ninth allows six weeks for exchanging the letters of ratification. Besides these, there was a separate article, which declared, "that the guaranty entered into by the contracting powers should not extend to the emperor's dominions, which might be attacked by the Turks." At the same time, his Britannic majesty declared authentically, "that notwithstanding the introduction of Spanish garrisons into the strong places of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, yet that he had no intention to depart from what had been settled by the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, either with regard to the rights of his imperial majesty and the empire, or to the security of the kingdoms and states, which his imperial majesty actually possesses in Italy; or, lastly, to the preservation of the quiet and dignity of those who were then the lawful possessors of those dutchies, and therefore he renews to the emperor the guaranty of those countries." But to take away all suspicion of the emperor's trifling in this matter, he published a declaration, of the same force and date with the treaty, importing, "that if the pregnant dutchess-dowager of Parma should be delivered of a son, the introduction of the Spanish troops to that dutchy should still take place; and that if she should be brought to bed of a daughter, Don Carlos was immediately to be put into possession of the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, by an eventual investiture from the emperor and the empire." And his imperial majesty farther declares, "that in case the dutchess-dowager should be delivered of a daughter, he will immediately withdraw his troops from the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, to give way to the peaceable possession."

Notwithstanding the states-general appeared as one of the principal contracting parties in this treaty, yet it was pretended that the nature of their government required some time before they could formally accede to it: but the real fact was, that the states, at the instigation of the French, who were greatly chagrined by this second treaty of Vienna, refused, at first, their being excluded from all the negotiations previous to a treaty in which they were inserted as principal contracting parties.

France had; at that time, superior influence in their government, either to the emperor or Great-Britain, as separate powers, but was not equal to them jointly; and the Dutch; after making several restrictions, acceded to the treaty.

France was highly offended at the guaranty of the pragmatic sanction by Great-Britain and the states-general; and so far prevailed upon the Spanish ministry, that a joint resolution was taken with the council of Madrid to render the execution of the treaty of Seville as difficult and as expensive to England as possible.

The dissensions that continued to rage in the British parliament, greatly contributed to encourage these attempts abroad. For while the government was making preparations for executing the favourite project of Spain, that of introducing Don Carlos into Italy, the parliament was daily receiving petitions, complaining of the Spanish depredations in the West-Indies. Nor had the commissaries appointed by his majesty, pursuant to the treaty of Seville, been able as yet to prevail upon the court of Madrid to name commissaries on her part, and consequently, had not made the smallest progress in obtaining satisfaction for the British sufferers. Every petition afforded fresh matter for railing against the minister, for not declaring war, or at least issuing orders for reprisals.

A.D. 1731. It is very difficult, perhaps impossible, to account, upon the principles of sound policy, for the backwardness of the ministry to enter into vigorous measures against Spain, who seemed to pay no regard to the many remonstrances sent thither; nor even to the articles of the treaty of Seville. The ministry, however, proceeded according to the plan they had formed; and on the fourteenth of July, Sir Charles Wager sailed from Portsmouth with a strong fleet, and arrived at Cadiz on the first of August. But finding the Spaniards were not ready, he proceeded to Barcelona; where being at last joined by the Spanish fleet, he pursued his course to Leghorn. In the mean time, proper dispositions were making for introducing, in a peaceable manner, the Spanish troops into the garrisoned towns of Italy. This was greatly facilitated by the duchess of Parma, who at last declared she was not with child: upon which the imperial general resigned to the duke of Tuscany, and the dutchess-dowager of Parma, as joint guardians to the infant Don Carlos, the administration of the dutchies of Parma and Placentia, and marched with his troops into the Milanese. Don Carlos being thus quietly settled, Wager returned with his fleet to England.

A.D. 1732. The ministry now challenged the boldest of their opponents to mention a single circumstance necessary for the tranquillity of Europe, that had been unprovided for. His majesty expressed the same sentiments in his speech, at the meeting of the parliament on the thirteenth of January. He assured them, that the general tranquillity of Europe was now established, and that all his desires on that head were fulfilled. "The share of credit and influence," added he, "which the crown of Great-Britain has had in bringing about this difficult and desirable work, and which redounds so much to the honour and interest of the nation, as it is universally confessed abroad, will, I am confident, be agreeable to my people, and acknowledged with gratitude by you. It is well known, that from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the several courts of Europe have been employed in finding means to execute, what the principal powers had agreed to, for the succession of Tuscany and Parma in favour of an infant of Spain; but the various jarring and contending interests were hard to be reconciled and united in effectuating a point of so much importance; the extended views and hopes of extending, on every side, further advantages, and the natural jealousies and distrusts arising among the several powers concerned, were not easily destroyed. Such opposite principles principles and purposes had kept in suspense; and unexecuted, what the court of Spain had very much at heart; and occasioned such troubles and disturbances as embarrassed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the interests of this nation.

"This happy situation of affairs," continued he, "will, I promise myself, inspire you all with such temper and unanimity, and such reasonable zeal for the public good; as becomes a parliament sensible of the great blessings they enjoy. The duty and affection of my subjects are all the return I desire for my paternal love and concern for them. My government has no security but what is equally conducive to your happiness, and to the protection of my people; and your prosperity has no foundation but in the defence and support of my government: our safety is mutual, our interests are inseparable."

It is sufficiently evident from this speech; that his majesty and his ministers imagined the success and wisdom of their conduct had stopped the mouth of opposition; and given universal satisfaction to the people. They were mistaken; the opposition continued as strong and violent as ever. The very motion for an address was opposed; the ministry ridiculed for the inconsistency of their negotiations, and some of them personally attacked with the severest reflections.

Sensible that the acrimony with which all their measures, both at home and abroad, were represented, the ministry resolved to make an essay towards recovering their popularity with the landed interest of England. This was no other than that of lessening the land-tax by reviving the duty upon salt. Accordingly, when the house was resolved into a committee, Sir Robert Walpole said, "That in raising the supply voted, his majesty was desirous that the burden should fall as equally as possible upon all his subjects: that it had long rested upon the gentlemen of the landed interest; and that as no tax could be more general than that upon salt, though, at the same time, severely felt by individuals, however poor; he moved, that, towards raising the supply granted to his majesty, the several duties on home-made salt, granted, by several acts of parliament, to king William, be revived, and granted to his majesty for the term of three years."

In order to support this motion, he said, he hoped the land-tax might be reduced one shilling in the pound; and observed how hard it bore upon ancient English families, who had many children, and but small estates to support them; but the reducing the land-tax might restore them to their ancient hospitality and figure, in their several counties; both which, by the pressure of that imposition, were now greatly reduced."

But this speech was not received with that pleasure he seemed to expect. Mr. Plummer, in very strong terms, endeavoured to prove, that the reasons for taking off the salt-duty was such as must always subsist against ever reviving it; because it was very justly considered as a tax that, of all others, was most burdensome to the poor, and the most pernicious to the trade of this kingdom: that the very character of a right tax was wanting in this; for it was so far from taxing the luxuries of life, that it taxed the most ordinary necessities: that the motion, if complied with, tended to distress the landed gentlemen more than the land-tax itself; because, by disabling manufacturers from carrying on their trade; it disabled tenants from paying their rents; and that it was, besides, highly impolitical; since the revival of it might tend to alienate the affections of the people from his majesty.

"I only desire," continued he, "that every landed gentleman who hears me, would consider what he would make of his estate, if we had no trade, no manufactures, nor any number of populous towns in England. Who would be such a fool as to desire to be relieved of one shilling in the pound upon the land-tax, when he must pay as much for the salt made use of in his family; and when at the same time he diminishes the yearly income of his estate much more than one shilling in the pound, nay much more than any land-tax ever amounted to in England. The land-tax is but an annual diminution of a gentleman's estate, he may perhaps be free from a part of it the ensuing year; but if, by the decay of our trade, and the charge laid upon the poor farmer, he is obliged to lower the rents of his estate, that will be diminution; which, I fear, will endure for ever."

This opposition was not expected, and therefore the arguments were the more difficult to be answered; especially as the opposition considered the tax in the most minute particulars. The bill, however, passed the house by a considerable majority. It was opposed with the same vigour in the house of peers; and when it passed near twenty lords entered their protests.

The private domestic occurrences of this year are not worth mentioning in a general history; but an opposition very dangerous to the minister, was now fomenting in the nation. The debates about the revival of the salt duty; and some other surmises, which had taken rise from the complaints of the officers of the revenue in general made of the collection of the duties upon wine and tobacco, two capital branches of the revenue; impressed the public with a notion, that either a general excise, or an excise on these two articles was intended by the minister. The whole nation was alarmed even before the minister had openly declared his intention.

A. D. 1733. Such was the disposition of the nation when the parliament met on the sixteenth of January. His majesty's speech was short and general; recommending, "the annual supplies in the least burdensome manner; and exhorting the members to avoid heats and animosities; and not to suffer themselves to be diverted, by any specious pretences, from steadfastly pursuing the true interest of their country."

But however inoffensive this speech might appear, yet an address, which was nothing more than its echo, was strongly opposed. Sir John Barnard opened the debate, and sufficiently shewed by his speech that he was no stranger to the scheme intended to be brought into the house by the minister, and that both himself and all his friends in the opposition were determined to exert all their power to render it abortive. He concluded with proposing an amendment to the address, implying, "that the manner of raising the supplies should be consistent with the trade, interest and liberty of the nation." Mr. Sandys seconded his motion; and Mr. Shippen moved for adding, "and such as shall be consistent with the honour and justice of parliament."

Sir Robert himself seconded these amendments; but could not help observing that he had reason to think some very unfair methods had been made use of, to make the people complain without any real foundation. The address, with these amendments, was agreed to; and his majesty returned a very gracious answer.

Among the number of debates which engaged the attention of the commons, that relating to the depredations of the Spaniards was the most interesting.

It was opened by Sir Wilford Lawson, who made a motion to address his majesty, "that there be laid before the house copies of the reports made by his majesty's commissaries in Spain; together with all letters and papers relating thereto, and what satisfaction had been made to the subjects of Great Britain for the losses they had sustained by the depredations of the Spaniards in Europe or the Indies, pursuant to the second separate article of the peace concluded at Seville."

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that this motion was made merely to distress him; but he could not, without the utmost danger to himself, prevent its passing. The British resident had presented several memorials memorials to the court of Spain, complaining that nothing had been done to prevent the depredations so long complained of in the American seas. At last the following cedula was obtained from the king of Spain.

"Whereas the British minister residing at this court, has represented to me, that notwithstanding the orders I have issued to hinder the Spanish privateers in America, from committing hostilities against the English, and their ships frequenting those seas; nevertheless not only such persons as have patents from some of the governors, of some of the ports in my dominions, but also some who have no patents at all, continue their hostilities under a pretence of preventing an illicit commerce; while the governors refuse to admit of the complaints given in by the English, who have experienced such unjust molestations, or to indemnify them of the losses they may have suffered hereby. My resolution is, that the orders already issued for that purpose should be repeated: whereby I command by these presents, all governors in any port or place of my dominions in America, not to suffer any of my subjects to molest or abuse the English, or any of their ships that shall sail in those seas, as long as they keep in their proper distances, and are not concerned in any illicit trade; and that my governors take special care, that my said subjects do conform exactly, and indispensibly to the royal laws and ordinances which treat of those matters; and if any of my subjects should commit any excess, contrary to those laws, I command my governors to punish them, with all the severity that the offence they shall have committed requires; as also such as, without patents, shall go to sea in order to commit hostilities, and make unlawful prizes: that the said governors do hearken to, and admit all complaints that shall be made to them, from the ministers or chief commanders of Great Britain, either by word of mouth, or by writing; taking care to do them justice at all times; and to give them testimonies of all that shall be transacted, and that satisfaction be given them, for the losses they may have sustained unjustly by the subjects, who may have occasioned them, and who ought to make them good; for such is my will: and the aforesaid governors are to understand that they shall be made accountable for the excesses committed by the privateers; because, before they grant them patents to go to sea, they ought to examine them who the persons are, and insist upon proper securities."

These concessions on the part of Spain might have been satisfactory between two ministers, who were not accountable for their conduct to any but their masters; but were far from being so to a British parliament. It was insisted upon by the opposition, that the expression in the catholic king's cedula, of proper distances to be kept by British ships on the coasts of America, was a fallacious condition, and tended to defeat the whole purpose which England ought to expect from the cedula. Because it was impossible for ships, sailing from one British colony to another, to be able to perform their voyages without being sometimes forced by accidents of winds and tides to come within distances of the Spanish coasts, which the Spaniards might judge to be improper distances, and therefore a sufficient cause for capture, according to the severest orders they might have from the court of Madrid.

These reasons formed the foundation of Sir Wilfred Lawson's motion; and had prevented the Spanish and-English commissioners from entering on a decisive plan for putting a final period to the differences that had so long subsisted between the two nations.

This Sir Robert Walpole plainly perceived, and was very sensible the opposition had gained a very material advantage over him; but he acted with great address. He frankly owned, "That his majesty had nothing to lay before the house, relative to the motion which had been made, because many unforeseen accidents had prevented the commissioners from entering upon business sooner than the month of February last: adding, that the delays they at first met with, rendered it necessary to prolong the time for settling and adjusting those matters; and accordingly it had been agreed between the two nations, that the three years shall be computed from that day in February last, on which the commissioners first met; and by that time, it is hoped, all those affairs will be settled in such a manner, as will give full satisfaction to every member of this house, and sufficient reparation to every one of the subjects of Great-Britain, who have met with a real injury from the Spaniards."

This apology was treated with great contempt by the opposition. It was said, "that the house ought not to take, from any member of it, an answer which they could regularly have from his majesty only: that as the commissioners had large stated salaries, it was not to be supposed they would be in a great hurry to lose them, by bringing the affair of their commission to a speedy issue: that in consequence of the vigorous remonstrances made in the last sessions of parliament, some English ships had been sent to the Spanish coast, to demand satisfaction; but having been treated with insults by the Spaniards, the commander, with the spirit of a true Englishman, seized the first Spanish ship he could meet with. This Spanish ship was, however, ordered to be restored, though the Spaniards have never thought proper to return their capture, nor have the owners received any satisfaction for the loss they have sustained."

To this fact it was answered, that though the English vessel in question had not been released, yet it was not owing to the orders of his Catholic majesty, which were pacific, but to the chicanery, excuses, and delays of the Spanish governors in America, who, notwithstanding the express orders from their court for delivering up the ship and cargo, had found some pretences for delay." This explanation was, however, far from being satisfactory: it was said, "that if the orders of his Catholic majesty were not obeyed, it would be in vain to carry on negotiations at the court of Madrid; but imitate the conduct of the English commander, and demand satisfaction from the American governors." Though the minister could easily have put a negative upon this amendment, yet he well knew it would render him extremely unpopular, which he was very desirous of avoiding: he therefore suffered the motion to be carried; and the address, with the proposed amendments, was presented to his majesty, who returned a most gracious answer.

The ferment in the nation every day increased, in expectation of a plan formed by Sir Robert Walpole, and generally known by the appellation of the Excise-scheme, which the minister had openly declared he intended to bring into the house. The nature of this scheme was still a secret; yet it was confidently given out by the opposition to be nothing less than a general excise, though the minister had never entertained any thought of that kind. He added, that all he intended was to prevent the frauds committed in collecting the duties upon wine and tobacco. The fourteenth of March was appointed for laying the whole scheme before the house. In the mean time, several pamphlets and papers were published on the subject of excise, and the whole painted in the most horrid colours by the anti-ministerial writers. These writings produced the desired effect; they raised an universal clamour against the minister, even before it had been offered to the parliament.

On the fourteenth of March, Sir Robert, in a long studied speech, explained his scheme. He began with taking notice of the arts which had been used to prejudice the people against his proposal, before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occasioned by these prejudices had originally arisen from smugglers and unfair traders, who had enriched themselves by cheating the public; and that these had been strenuously assisted by another set of men, fond fond of every opportunity to stir up the people to mutiny and sedition. He expatiated on the frauds daily committed in that branch of the revenue arising from tobacco; upon the hardships to which the American planters were subjected by the heavy duties payable on importation, as well as by the ill usage they had met with from their factors and correspondents in England, who, from being their servants, were now become their masters; upon the injury done to the fair trader; and upon the loss sustained by the public in respect to the revenue. He asserted, that the scheme he was going to propose, would remove all these inconveniences, prevent numberless frauds, perjuries, and false entries, and add two or three hundred thousand pounds a year to the revenue. He entered into a long detail of the frauds practised by the unfair dealers in those commodities; he recited the several acts of parliament relating to the duties on wine and tobacco; he declared he had no intention to promote a general excise; and he endeavoured to obviate some objections that might be made to his plan, which he now proceeded to explain. He proposed to join the laws of excise to those of the customs: that the former subsidy of three farthings per pound, chargeable on imported tobacco, should be still levied at the custom-house, and payable, as before, to his majesty's civil list: that the tobacco should then be lodged in warehouses appointed for that purpose by the commissioners of excise: that the keeper of each warehouse, appointed also by the commissioners, should have one lock and key, and the merchant importer another; and that the tobacco should be thus secured till the merchant should find vent for it either for foreign or home consumption: that the part designed for exportation should be weighed at the custom-house, discharged of the three farthings per pound, paid at its first importation, and then exported without any farther trouble: that the portion designed for home consumption should, in the presence of the warehouse-keeper, be delivered to the purchaser, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound to the proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eased of the inconvenience of paying the duty on importation, or of giving bond, and finding securities for the payment before he found a market for the commodity: that all the penalties and forfeitures, so far as they formerly belonged to the crown, should, for the future, be applied to the use of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other cases relating to the excise, should be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majesty, and in the country by the judge of assize upon the next circuit, who should hear and determine such appeals in the most summary manner, without the formality of proceeding in courts of law and equity.

Such was the substance of the famous excise-scheme, the proposing of which occasioned the most interesting debate that could happen in a British house of commons. It held till two o'clock the next morning, and was managed by the most able speakers on both sides of the question. Those who argued against the scheme, accused the minister of having misrepresented the frauds, and made false calculations with regard to the hardships under which the planters were laid to labour. They affirmed that the planters had never thought of complaining till they were put upon it, by letters and applications from London: that the scheme was so far from being calculated to relieve the planters, that the factors would be exposed to such grievous oppressions, as would render it impossible for them to continue the trade, whence the planters must be ruined; and that, after all, it would not prevent the frauds against which it was said to be provided: that from the examination of the commissioners of the customs, it appeared that those frauds did not exceed forty thousand pounds a year, and might, in a great measure, be abolished by a due execution of the laws in being; consequently, the scheme was unnecessary; would be ineffectual in augmenting the revenue, destructive to trade, and dangerous to the liberties of the subject, as it tended to promote a general excise, which was in all countries considered as a very grievous oppression. They suggested, that it would produce an additional swarm of officers and warehouse-keepers appointed and paid by the treasury, which could not fail of multiplying the dependents on the crown, and enable it still farther to check the freedom of elections: that the traders would become slaves to excisemen and warehouse-keepers, as they would be debarred all access to their own commodities, except at certain hours, when they were attended by these officers: that the merchant, for every pound of tobacco he should sell, would be obliged to make a journey, or send a messenger to the office for a permit, which could not be obtained without trouble, expence, and delay; and that if a law should be enacted in favour of this scheme, it would, in all probability, be, some time or other, used as a precedent for introducing excise laws into every branch of the revenue; and whenever this happened, the boasted liberties of England would be no more.

But notwithstanding these, and other powerful reasons, which were urged by the opposition, the question being put, upon a motion made by the minister, that the present duties on wine and tobacco should, from and after the twenty-fourth of June next, cease and determine, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of sixty-one. The other resolutions subsequent to this, for altering the customs to an inland duty upon these commodities, and for appropriating this inland duty to the same uses as the customs, were passed without a division.

On the sixteenth, the committee made their report, and a very long and warm debate ensued; but the question being put, it was carried in the affirmative; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, pursuant to these resolutions. It was accordingly presented to the house on the fourth of April, and read the first time; and, after a very powerful opposition, ordered to be read a second time. The whole trading part of the nation was now alarmed; and the lord-mayor having procured a copy of the bill, laid it before the common-council, where it was unanimously resolved to petition the house against it. The petition was immediately drawn up, and presented to the house by the sheriffs. As soon as it was read, Sir John Barnard rose, and, in a very expressive manner, represented how much the city and citizens of London, as well as all the other trading cities and towns in the kingdom, would be affected by the bill for altering the method of raising the duties payable upon tobacco; and how just reason they had to insist upon being heard by their council against it. He said, that he would not entertain a suspicion that the ministry wished not to hear every thing that could, with reason, be advanced against the bill; and therefore moved, that the petitioners might be heard by their council against it.

This motion, however reasonable it might appear, was strongly opposed. It was insisted upon, that it had always been the practice of that house never to receive any petition, much less to admit council to be heard against any bill for imposing taxes on the subject; because it would then be impossible ever to pass any such bill, as the number of petitions presented against it would, doubtless, be too great to examine during one session of parliament; that no inconvenience could arise in refusing to admit council to be heard against it; because every man, and every body of men, had their representatives in that house, who would certainly espouse their cause, should they think themselves aggrieved by any particular hardship.

To this it was answered, that the house had never pretended to any particular custom of refusing petitions, except against those bills which were called money-bills; that is, such as were brought in for raising money for the service of the current year; and that even with regard to them, there were many precedents where the house had admitted the parties, whom they thought to be particularly interested, to be heard by their council against the passing such bills; that the admitting council, even in such cases, could never prevent their passing, because the house could order all persons petitioning to be heard at one time; and give such directions, that it could never take up many days to hear every thing that could be objected by every one of the petitioners: that tho' every part of the nation had their representatives in that house, yet it was very well known, that speaking in public was not the talent of every man; whence it might happen, that the particular persons, or part of the nation that would be most aggrieved, might not have any such members who could lay their case properly, clearly, and fully, before the house; and therefore it was proper, even with regard to money-bills, to admit parties to be heard by counsel against them, when it appeared that they were particularly interested in the transaction. But with regard to the case before them, there was not the least pretence for refusing the request of the petition, because the bill against which it was presented was no money-bill; on the contrary, it was insisted on by the advocates for it, as one of the greatest arguments in its favour, that there were no new duties to be imposed; it was a bill intended only to alter the method of collecting the taxes already imposed; and therefore it could never be pretended, that there was any practice or custom of the house to refuse parties interested to be heard against such a bill: that if there had been such a custom introduced, it ought not to be observed, especially when so considerable a body as the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, came with an humble petition to be heard against the bill, which they thought would not only be highly injurious to them in particular, but destructive to the trade and commerce of the whole nation. The motion was, however, rejected by a majority of seventeen only. The petition was therefore ordered to lie upon the table till the bill should be read a second time.

While the bill was depending before the commons, the minds of the people were wrought up to such a pitch of fury and resentment, as seemed to threaten nothing less than a rebellion. The house was surrounded with crowds of people; most of the principal merchants of London attended in the court of requests and lobby of the house of commons. This exasperated the minister, who, after declaring that he did not consider the clamours without doors to be the voice of the people, concluded his speech with the following incautious and inflammatory expressions: "Gentlemen may say what they please of the multitudes now at the door, and in the avenues leading to this house: they may call them a modest multitude, if they will; but whatever temper they were in when they came hither, it may be very much altered now, after having waited so long at our door: it may be a very easy matter for some designing, seditious person, to raise a tumult and disorder among them; and when tumults are once begun, no man knows where they may end: he is a greater man than any I know in the nation; that could, with the same facility, appease them. For this reason, I must think, that it was neither prudent nor regular to use any methods for bringing such multitudes to this place, under any pretence whatever. Gentlemen may give them what name they think fit: it may be said they came hither as humble supplicants; but I know whom the law calls sturdy beggars; and those who brought them hither could not be certain but that they might have behaved in the same manner."

The house was immediately in a flame; and it was some time before the temper of the members was settled sufficiently to renew the debate. At last Sir John Barnard arose; and after making several observations on the beginning of the minister's speech, said, "that any set of gentlemen or merchants might take what method they pleased to solicit their friends and persons of figure and character, to come down to the court of requests, and to our lobby, in order to petition their acquaintance against any scheme or project they think may be prejudicial to their interests. This is the undoubted right of the subject, and what has been always practised. The honourable gentleman talks of sturdy beggars: I do not know what sort of people may now be at our door, because I have not lately been out of the house; but I believe they are the same sort of people that were there when I came in; and then, I can assure you, that I saw none but such as deserved the name of sturdy beggars as little as the honourable gentleman himself, or any gentleman whatever. It is well known, that the city of London was sufficiently apprized of what was this day to come under our deliberation. Where they procured their information, I know not; but I am very certain they had a right notion of this scheme; and were so generally and zealously bent against it, that whatever methods may have been used to call them hither, I am sure it would have been impossible to have found any legal method to have prevented their coming."

But though the minister carried his point with regard both to the London petition, and to the bill's being read a second time, yet he thought it highly prudent not to push his scheme any farther. He could not hope that the majority ever would be greater, and a question of such importance to the public tranquillity, carried by a majority of only seventeen, was worse than lost. He therefore wisely determined to let it drop; and accordingly, when the day came for its being read a second time, Sir Robert Walpole moved, that it might be put off till the twelfth of June next.

Thus ended the famous excise scheme, a project which the populace were persuaded threatened the entire destruction of their liberties; but which, now the rage of party has subsided, and the whole has been considered by the calm methods of unbiassed reason, has lost great part of its horror, and even considered in a very favourable light.

On the eleventh of June, his majesty came to the house of peers, and put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, in which he severely reflected on the authors of the heats and animosities that had been lately spread through the nation. "I cannot," said he, "pass by, unobserved, the wicked endeavours that have been lately made use of to inflame the minds of the people, and, by the most unjust misrepresentations, to raise tumults and disorders that almost threatened the peace of the kingdom; but I depend upon the force of truth to remove the groundless jealousies that have been raised of designs carrying on against the liberties of my people; and, upon your own fidelity, to defeat and frustrate the expectations of such as delight in confusion. It is my inclination, and has always been my study, to preserve the religious and civil rights of all my subjects. Let it be your care to undeceive the deluded, and to make them sensible of their present happiness, and the hazard they run of being unwarily drawn, by specious pretences, into their own destruction."

The affairs on the continent, relative to the tranquillity of England, may be comprized in a very little compass. The death of Augustus II. king of Poland, which happened on the fifth of February, occasioned a dreadful scene of war in Europe. Stanislaus, father-in-law to the French king, and the elector of Saxony, son to the deceased king, were candidates for the Polish sceptre. The former was supported by France, and the latter by the emperor, the czarina, and the king of Prussia. England could not declare herself without the concurrence of the united provinces; and that cautious republic shewed a visible reluctance to launch into an expensive and ruinous war, merely for the sake of supporting the emperor's quarrel. In vain did the emperor's ministers nisters solicit, with the greatest earnestness, both at the court of London and at the Hague, to take the most speedy and vigorous measures to prevent their ally from being crushed by the power of his enemies; and the balance of power in Europe thereby utterly destroyed.

A. D. 1734. Such was the state of affairs when the parliament met on the seventeenth of January; and the session was opened by a speech from the throne, in which his majesty, among other particulars, told the two houses, "That though he was no way concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle spectator of the present events, or be indifferent about the consequences of a war undertaken and supported by such a powerful confederacy: that he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both sides, and to wait the result of the councils of those powers which were more immediately interested in the consequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, especially with the states-general of the united provinces, such measures as should be thought most advisable for the common safety, and for restoring the peace of Europe: that he would order the estimates to be laid before them, of such services as demanded their present and immediate care: that the augmentation that would be proposed for the sea-service, would be very considerable; but he was confident they would think it reasonable and necessary; that he most particularly recommended to their care the debt of the navy, which had been every year laid before them; but, from the present circumstances of the times, he believed they would be persuaded that he now required some provision to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer postponed, without manifest detriment to the public service: that, as these extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raise the supplies necessary for defraying them, with that readiness and dispatch, and with that just regard to the true interest of his people, which this parliament had hitherto shewn upon all occasions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with such temper and unanimity, and such expedition in the public business, as might give him the sooner opportunity of consulting a new parliament: that he flattered himself his present resolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and whatever insinuations might be thrown out against the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundless jealousies, and make it appear, that Great-Britain ought always to act that part which the honour and interest of the nation called upon it to undertake."

This speech caused a violent debate in the house of commons, though it must be owned, without any necessity, there was nothing in the speech exceptionable. The ministerial party, however, prevailed, and an address of thanks was voted to his majesty. Several other topics that came before the house, occasioned very warm debates, in which the speeches generally abounded with personal satire, and often with very indecent reflections. But the subject that gave occasion to the most violent debates between the two parties, was a motion made by Mr. Bromley for repealing the act for septennial parliaments.

In support of this motion, he alledged, that the reasons for prolonging the sitting of parliament from three to seven years, were now at an end: that the people in general looked upon septennial parliaments as a grievance and innovation in the constitution: that he begged leave to remind the house of the act made in the sixteenth of Charles II. which wisely provided against the too long continuance of one and the same parliament, by ordaining that a new parliament should be called once in three years, and oftener, if need required: that this act was expressly confirmed by the bill of rights: that from the time of the revolution to the first year of the late king, no parliament had sat above three years; and some only one session: that he thought triennial parliaments were more grievous than annual ones; and consequently septennial parliaments must be doubly more grievous than those which lasted only three years: that supposing he should be mistaken in this point, which, nevertheless, he could never admit without due conviction; the argument in the preamble to the septennial bill was altogether inapplicable to the present times: that the act against bribery and corruption would necessarily remedy that evil, as it would prevent corruption in the elections; but nothing but the frequent returns of new parliaments could prevent it in the elected. In order, therefore, to effect this desirable purpose, he moved, that leave be given to bring in a bill for repealing the septennial; and for the more frequent meeting and calling of parliaments.

Sir John Aubin, knight of the shire for Cornwall, seconded Mr. Bromley. In his speech upon this occasion, he gave a kind of detail of the duration of parliaments from the time of Henry VIII. shewed how triennial parliaments came to be secured at the revolution, and how they came to be lost again to the nation when the septennial act took place. He was next at some pains to prove, that septennial parliaments are most proper for the purposes of a wicked ministry; but that the more frequent parliaments are, they are the more salutary both for the king and people; and, at the same time, throughout his whole speech, he complained greatly of the increasing influence of the crown. He was answered by Mr. Conduit, a relation of the great Sir Isaac Newton. He endeavoured to shew, from Prynne's writings, that the prerogatives of the kings of England, and the liberties of the people, are very different from what they were in former days. He took notice, that the heavy complaints against Charles I. and his son James II. did not arise from continuing the same parliament too long, but for not calling, or not holding any parliament at all. He thought that ministers could more easily manage a triennial than a septennial parliament; and confirmed his observations by saying, that in septennial parliaments it has been seen, that a small minority against the minister at the beginning of the parliament, has often increased greatly, and even nearly to an equality before the end. He thought that the disposal of posts and places rather weakened than strengthened the crown; because every place having three or four candidates for it, when one only can succeed, the disappointed candidates immediately become enemies to the court. He maintained, that the reasons for passing the septennial act still existed; that one of the reasons was a spirit of jacobitism prevailing when the septennial act passed; and he thought that the great discontent that had lately appeared in the nation, had a considerable mixture of jacobitism in their composition.

The next who spoke was Sir Thomas Robinson, who maintained, that the expence of chusing triennial parliaments must fall far heavier upon the public than that of chusing septennial ones. He observed, that during the twenty-two years, while triennial parliaments continued, they were found to be attended with great inconveniencies; whereas, during the eighteen years in which septennial parliaments had continued, many excellent laws had passed, and many wise institutions had been formed for the good of the people. He took notice, that when gentlemen speak of the whole constitution of England, they speak in very vague terms; because the constitution of England was never fixed till the time of the revolution. He next examined the state of parliaments under the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. and maintained, that in the longest parliament that ever sat in England, which happened under the latter, the longer they sat, they were more and more averse to the measures of the crown, notwithstanding all the power of corruption employed to seduce them; and therefore, by parity of reasoning, septennial parliaments are more favourable to public liberty than triennial ones. In short, he thought, that a desire to revert back to the practice of remote antiquity in that respect, might be compared to a man in his full growth and strength, desiring to return back to his childhood. He observed, that, if antiquity was to be the only rule, a session of parliament ought seldom or never to continue above twenty days; for parliaments, in former times, had not business sufficient to keep them any longer sitting: but, in fact, the whole form of the constitution has been since altered, by the alterations that have, from time to time, happened in the modes of property and the multiplication of business, through the increase of agriculture, arts, manufactures and commerce. He affirmed, that should the motion be agreed to, it must have a very bad effect upon all foreign negotiations, because foreign ministers, in their negotiations with Great-Britain, and also with other courts, are chiefly determined by the sentiments of a British parliament: but should they have those to consult anew every three years, they would not be able to know how to determine with regard to many great and important points.

Sir Watkin Williams Wynne, who had acquired great experience in elections for members of parliament, spoke strongly for the question. He insisted upon it, that a man who could get a hundred guineas for his vote for a septennial parliament, would not get fifteen for a triennial one; and that bribery and corruption are the natural consequences of long parliaments. He was answered by Sir John Willes, attorney-general. He observed, that if any time was to be fixed upon for imitating the old constitution with regard to parliaments, "we are not surely," said he, "to take the time when our constitution was weak, and in its infancy; we certainly should chuse that time, when it had reached its full strength and vigour, which, in my opinion, is the present. But as gentlemen have mentioned the bill of rights, let us examine how it stood at that time; for I am persuaded it will be agreed to by every gentleman in this house, that after that claim was settled and confirmed, our constitution has been more vigorous than it ever was before that time; and yet, even in this claim of rights, there is no mention made of frequent new parliaments: it is, indeed, said, that, for the redress of grievances, and for amending, strengthening and preserving the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently; but it is not so much as insinuated, that every one of these ought to be a new parliament; and as to the frequency of parliaments, I am sure there never was less reason for complaints than since the septennial bill passed; for, ever since that time, the sessions have been regularly held, and all of them been allowed to sit as long as it was necessary or proper they should. He then observed, that the triennial act itself was not obtained upon principles of liberty, but in order to distress king William, and the friends to the revolution. He was of opinion, that the transition of the constitution from triennial to septennial parliaments, was, in itself, a right measure, and agreeable to the true principles of English government, independent of any temporary consideration. He maintained, that it was owing to the inconveniencies of triennial parliaments, that king William was obliged to make so bad a peace with France, when he might have carried on the war in so advantageous a manner for the liberties of Europe.

In answer to the objection, that the elected, during a long parliament, are apt to forget their dependence upon their constituents, which could not be the case if parliaments were annual, he made the following observations: "That we have all a dependence upon the people for our election, is what I readily grant; but after we are chosen, and have taken our seats in this house, we have no longer any dependence on our electors; at least so far as regards our behaviour here. Their whole power is then devolved upon us; and we are, in every question that comes before this house, to regard only the public good in general, and to determine according to our own judgments; if we do not, if we depend upon our constituents, and follow blindly the instructions they send us, we cannot be said to act freely, nor can such parliaments be called free parliaments; such a dependence would be a most dangerous dependence; it would, in my opinion, be more dangerous, and of worse consequence, than a dependence upon the crown; for in a dependence upon the crown I can see no danger, as long as the interest of the crown is made the same with that of the people, which every man must allow to be the case at present: whereas the people of any county, city, or borough, are very liable to be misled, and may often be induced to give instructions directly contrary to the true interest of their country."

Sir John Barnard attacked this doctrine with all his power. "A learned and honourable gentleman" said he, "has advanced a doctrine which I think altogether new; that we are to have no farther dependence on our electors, after we have taken our seats in this house; nay, that a dependence on them would be more dangerous than a dependence on the crown. This, Sir, is really, in my opinion, something very new. Though that gentleman may, perhaps, like the one better than the other, yet I shall always look upon a dependence on the people of England, or even on those I represent, to be less dangerous; and more honourable, than a dependence on the crown; and I value myself more on the honour I have received in sitting here for two parliaments, as one of the representatives of the people of England, and by the free and uncorrupted choice of those I represent, than I should on the greatest honours the crown can bestow. If, indeed, I had obtained my seat here by bribery, or the illegal and corrupt influence of any corrupt minister, I should look upon it in a very different light; I should look upon it as one of the most disgraceful situations I could be in."

Sir William Yonge replied to these remarks of Sir John Barnard. "My learned friend" said he, "happened to make an observation, which I still think a very just one. He said, that after we were returned, and had taken our seats in this house, we ought not any longer to have a dependence on those we represent. This the honourable gentleman laid hold of. He not only called it a new and very extraordinary doctrine, but dropt an expression, such as I think ought not to be made use of in this house. As to the observation made by my learned friend, he certainly meant, and I believe almost every gentleman understood him, that after we had taken our seats in this house, we ought every one of us to look upon ourselves as one of the representatives of the whole body of the commons of England, and ought not to have any particular bias for the county, city, or borough, we represent. This, Sir, is so far from being a doctrine very extraordinary, or altogether new, that I wish every gentleman in this house would make it a standing rule for his conduct; for I cannot help observing, that there are some in this assembly, who, on many occasions, confine their thoughts too much to the particular county, city, or borough they represent; but surely they must be sensible, that many things may happen in parliament which may be for the interest of the nation in general, though they may not, perhaps, quadrate so exactly with the particular interest of London, Bristol, Liverpool, or other particular places; and, in such a case, the gentleman himself must surely grant, that, as members of this house, they ought to drop not only their dependence upon, but even their concern for the particular city they represent, in order to concur with the rest of the members of this house, in what they judge to be for the general interest of the nation."

Several other speeches were made on this interesting motion; but when the question was put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of two hundred and forty-seven against one hundred and eighty-four.

On the fourteenth of March, the nuptial ceremony between the prince of Orange and the princess-royal of England was performed with great pomp; and some days were spent in the warmest congratulations from both houses of parliament, the city of London, and other public bodies, upon the marriage.

The business before the parliament being completed, the king came to the house of peers on the sixteenth of April, and put an end to the session with a speech from the throne, in which he "congratulated the two houses on their unanimity, and upon the measures that had been taken for reducing the navy debt, which, he said, had been unavoidably incurred, and bore a higher interest than the national debt." He then proceeded, in a most pathetic manner, to recommend unanimity to his people, and requested the members to use their best endeavours to heal the unhappy divisions of the kingdom. "It would" added he, "be the greatest satisfaction to me, to see a perfect harmony restored among them that have one and the same principle at heart; that there might be no distinction but of such as mean the support of our present constitution in church and state, and such as wish to subvert both." This is the only distinction that ought to prevail in this country, where the interest of king and people is one and the same, and where they cannot subsist but by being so. If religion, liberty, and property, were never at any time more fully enjoyed, without not only an attempt, but even the shadow of a design, to alter or invade them, let not these sacred names be made use of as artful and plausible pretences to undermine the present establishment, under which alone they can be safe.

"I have nothing to wish, but that my people may not be misguided: I appeal to their own consciences for my conduct, and hope the providence of God will direct them in the choice of such representatives as are most fit to be trusted with the care and preservation of the protestant religion, the present establishment, and all the religious and civil rights of Great-Britain."

Soon after the rising of the parliament, it was dissolved by proclamation, and writs were issued for calling a new one. The whole nation was immediately thrown into a ferment, and every means made use of to influence the electors in their choice of representatives. The power of the ministry, however, prevailed; and the elections, in most parts of the kingdom, were carried in favour of the court.

During these transactions in England, Stanislaus had been elected to fill the throne of Poland; but the opposition against him was too powerful for him to withstand. He retired to Dantzick, where the inhabitants promised to defend him at all events. He had no sooner left the capital, than the other party proceeded to a new election, and Augustus was now placed on the Polish throne. The Russian army then advanced against Dantzick, and laid great part of the city in ashes. Stanislaus, who felt more for the misery of his friends than for his own, determined not to persevere in a defence which must be attended with the destruction of the whole city. He accordingly made his escape from Dantzick in a very wonderful manner, and the city immediately opened her gates to the Russian army, and peace was restored, on the inhabitants acknowledging the right of king Augustus to the crown of Poland.

The war in Italy was carried on with great success against the emperor. Two very bloody battles were fought at Parma and Guastalla with doubtful success. Don Carlos took possession of Naples and Sicily, and was placed upon the Neapolitan throne. Nor was any thing omitted by the English ministry for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence, as the conduct of some of the allies was very doubtful.

The court of Spain suffered the eldest son of the pretender to serve in the army of Don Carlos, by whom he was treated with distinguished marks of respect. That prince even made no scruple of declaring publicly, that whenever the situation of his affairs would permit, he would support the interest of the abdicated family with all his power.

A. D. 1735. The new parliament met at Westminster on the twenty-third of January, and was opened with a speech from the throne, in which his majesty informed the two houses, That having undertaken, in concert with the states-general, to mediate between the belligerent powers, he had met with so much success, that a plan would speedily be offered to the consideration of all parties engaged in the war, as a basis for a negotiation for a general peace. He also acquainted them, that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark; a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the present conjuncture; and which, being attended with some expence, he would order it to be submitted to the consideration of the commons. At the same time, he put them in mind, that while a war was raging in Europe, it would be proper, at all events, though it might be attended with some expence, for Great-Britain to keep her forces on a respectable footing.

In the course of this session, the mutiny-bill received a very material alteration. In all the preceding acts, the justice of peace had it in his power to commit a poor fellow to prison, if, after receiving the inlisting money, he refused to take the oaths, even though he offered to return the money: but a clause was now inserted, importing, that every officer who should hereafter inlist any man to serve in any regiment, should, within a certain number of days, carry the person inlisted before one of the next justices of the peace, where the man should be at liberty to declare his dissent to such an act, and his having repented of what he had done; and upon his doing this, and returning the officer the inlisting money, and paying the expences incurred in the progress of the affair, such justice should forthwith discharge him; and that an officer guilty of any failure or neglect in this particular, should be liable to the same penalties as are inflicted on those who should be guilty of false musters.

But an affair of a much more serious nature was now before the commons. The magistrates of the royal burgh of Haddington had been seized and confined in a distant prison, without the benefit of being admitted to bail, by a warrant from one of the Scottish judges. Another judge, however, had ventured to take bail, and set them at liberty. The injured party presented a petition to the house of commons; and the case appeared so flagrant, that a motion was made to refer it to the consideration of a committee of the whole house. This was, however, opposed by the minister and his friends, from what motive is hard to say; and the motion was rejected.

Another incident that had happened in Scotland, greatly engaged the attention of parliament. This was a petition to the house of lords, subscribed by the dukes of Hamilton, Queensbury, and Montrose, by the earls of Dundonald, Marchmont, and Stair; representing, that undue influence had been used in carrying on the election of the sixteen peers of Scotland.

A day was appointed for taking this petition into consideration; but the house seemed divided with regard to the manner in which they ought to proceed in this delicate and interesting affair. The duke of Newcastle observed, that it was doubtful whether the house had even the power of receiving such a petition, there being nothing in the articles of union that gave a British house of lords a right to interfere in the election of the Scottish peers; nor indeed had they otherwise any such right, unless some particular charge was stated, and offered to be proved. On the other hand, the party that supported the petition urged, that it was general; that the facts contained in it were of a very dangerous complexion, and such as ought to be punished if they were proved. But as the real design of the petition seemed to be uncertain, it was agreed that the consideration should be adjourned for a little time, during which the petitioners should be ordered to declare, "Whether they intended to controvert the election of the sixteen peers, or the election of any, and which of them?"

This order being communicated by the lord chancellor to the petitioners, they, in a few days, delivered in a declaration, importing, "that they did not intend to oppose either the election, or return of the sixteen Scottish peers; but they thought it their duty to lay before their lordships the evidence of such facts and undue methods as appeared to them to be dangerous to the constitution, and might, in future elections, equally affect the right of the present sixteen peers, as that of the other peers of Scotland, if not timely prevented by a proper remedy."

When this declaration was read in the house, it was objected to by the court party, as unsatisfactory. The duke of Devonshire therefore made a motion, "That the petitioners should be ordered to lay before the house, in writing, instances of those undue methods and illegal practices upon which they intended to proceed, and also the names of the persons they suspected to be guilty." This motion was warmly opposed by the earls of Chesterfield, Abingdon, and Strafford, and the lords Bathurst and Carteret. Lord Chesterfield concluded his speech on this occasion with the following remarkable expressions, "Supposing, my lords, we should get information that several barrels of gunpowder had been placed under this house, in order to blow us up; would it not be very foolish to delay going to search for and remove the gunpowder, till we should be informed by what means, at what time, and by whom the powder was placed there? The case before us is the very same: there is a sort of metaphorical gunpowder placed under this house, which will, in time, blow us up, if it be not removed; and, in such a case, are we to trifle away our time in inquiries after the names of the persons who placed it there, and the methods by which it was conveyed?" However beautiful and expressive this comparison might be, it produced not the desired effect; like the reasonings of the other lords, it was overcome by the majority, who voted the declaration unsatisfactory; and the petitioners were ordered, in eight days, to lay their complaints before the house in writing.

Accordingly the petitioning noblemen presented a remonstrance to the lords on the day appointed, in which they observed, "That as they had no intention to become accusers, they could not take upon them to name particular persons, who might have been concerned in those illegal practices; but who they were would undoubtedly appear to their lordships, upon their taking the proper examination: that, nevertheless, they begged leave to acquaint their lordships, that the petition was laid before them upon information that the list of the sixteen peers for Scotland had been framed previous to the election, by persons in high trust under the crown: that this list was shewn to the peers, as a list approved by the crown, and was called the king's list, from which there was to be no variation, unless to make way for one or two particular peers, on condition of their conforming to certain measures: that peers were solicited to vote for this list, without the liberty of making any alteration: that endeavours were used to engage their suffrages for this list by the promise of pensions and offices, civil and military, to themselves and relations, as well as by offers of money: that sums of money were actually given for this purpose: that pensions, offices, and releases of debts owing to the crown, were granted to peers who concurred in voting for this list, and to their relations: that on the day of election, a battalion of his majesty's troops was drawn up in the Abbey-court, contrary to custom, and without any other apparent cause than that of over-awing the electors: that these instances of undue practices would, they hoped, be abundantly sufficient to satisfy their lordships, that they had just cause to pray the house to take this matter into their serious consideration; and to provide such remedy as might be effectual for preserving the right and freedom of elections; such right of electing being the only right that now remained with the peers of Scotland, in lieu of a constant and hereditary seat in parliament."

The reading of this remonstrance gave rise to another warm debate. The holding under arms a battalion of soldiers was represented as a most scandalous, arbitrary, and flagrant infringement of the rights and liberties of the subject, and of that independency that should ever be preserved in all elections. The fact was acknowledged by the opposite party; but it was alledged that such a step was at once both legal and prudent: that the soldiers were drawn out by the authority of the civil magistrate, in order to prevent riots and tumults among the populace, who had been inflamed by the opposite party to a pitch of resentment that threatened the most fatal consequences, if not timely suppressed. These reasons prevailed with the majority, the petition was voted unsatisfactory, and the whole affair laid aside.

The supplies being granted, and the other business of the session completed, the session was closed on the fifteenth of May by a speech from the throne, in which his majesty was pleased to acknowledge, that the plan of pacification he had formed with the states-general had not yet proved effectual; but added, that he was still determined to persist in the same pacific measures, and to use his utmost endeavours to compose the troubles of Europe. He thanked the parliament for the power they had given him to augment his forces by sea and land; acquainted them with his intention to visit his German dominions, and that he should constitute the queen regent during his absence.

The affairs of Europe were, at this juncture, in a delicate and critical situation. The emperor complained loudly of the pacific and pusillanimous measures of the English court, which, from the treaties still subsisting between Great-Britain and the empire, he expected would have espoused his cause. In the mean time, the belligerent powers grew heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to acknowledge their real sentiments. At last an armistice took place between the emperor and France; which gave occasion to some preliminary articles, by which the latter offered to restore to the empire all the places she had taken during the war. It was also stipulated, that the emperor should possess the Mantuan, Parma, Placentia, and the Milanese. Don Carlos was to be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily; the duchy of Tuscany was assigned to the duke of Lorraine; who afterwards married Maria-Theresa, eldest daughter to the emperor: the duchy of Lorraine was annexed to the crown of France, and the duchy of Bar given to Stanislaus, king of Poland, who renounced that crown, but was to enjoy the title. By this plan of pacification, Leghorn was to be declared a free port; France was to guaranty the pragmatic sanction; and England, Holland, Portugal and Vienna, were to be solicited to guaranty the present treaty, to which the kings of Spain and Sardinia were to be invited to accede.

A.D. 1736. The parliament met on the fifteenth of January, when it appeared, by his majesty's speech, that the plan of pacification between the French and imperial courts was nearly the same with that which had been concerted between him and the states-general, though communicated as a new plan formed by the principal contracting powers. He told both houses of parliament, "That he had agreed to the plan which had been communicated to the kings of Spain and Sardinia; and there were hopes of their agreeing to it, upon their obtaining reasonable security security for their possessing the countries stipulated to them." His majesty added, "That he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces both by sea and land; but hoped they would agree to some extraordinary expence, till the peace of Europe was more fully settled;" and concluded with pathetically exhorting them, in imitation of the great powers of Europe, to peace and unanimity.

The supplies were voted without any remarkable debate; but a subject of the greatest importance to the safety of the nation soon after engaged the attention of parliament. The drinking of geneva, and other distilled spirituous liquors, had, for some years past, encreased to a surprizing degree, especially among the lower class of people, of whom thousands had already perished by this abominable practice, and a much greater number were rendered wholly unfit for labour or service. At the same time their morals had been so greatly debauched, that a general dissoluteness had taken place among them. These pernicious liquors, of which gin was principally drank, were not only sold by distillers, but retailed in the smallest quantities in every petty chandler's shop and coal-shed, in the metropolis; by which means, journeymen, apprentices, and servants, were drawn in to intoxicate themselves with this bewitching fluid. In short, there was the greatest reason to apprehend, that the public welfare and safety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by this practice, which was so dangerous to the health, strength, peace and morals; and even threatened the total extinction of the lower class of people. Induced by these melancholy considerations, the magistrates of Middlesex presented a petition to the house of commons, in which they enumerated these evils, and prayed the house to take the matter into their serious consideration, and apply such remedy as they should think proper.

After a thorough examination of this affair, a motion was made for levying a duty of two shillings per gallon upon all spiritous liquors, and that fifty shillings should be paid to his majesty for a licence, to be taken out yearly by every person who should sell any of whatever kind.

This occasioned a very warm debate. It was said, that these duties amounted to a prohibition; and as this extended to rum, there was great reason to fear that it would prove of fatal consequence to the British sugar islands, which were already in a declining condition: that many thousands depended for their livelihood on the British distillery; and that it was highly absurd to argue against the use of a thing from the abuse of it.

To this it was answered, that nothing but the extreme danger of the nation, from the excessive use of spirituous liquors, could have induced them to make such a motion: that they were fully sensible of the difficulties to which great numbers of his majesty's subjects would be reduced by the duties proposed to be laid on such liquors; but that the interest of individuals ought to give way to the general interest; and where the preservation of the community was visibly and so essentially concerned, the hardships of some few individuals must be overlooked: that with respect to rum and brandy, it was very certain those liquors had often been drank to very great excess, notwithstanding the high duties laid upon them, and were as pernicious both to the health and morals of the people as any home made spirit: that if any sorts of spirits were exempted from the duties now proposed, the retailer would sell the most pernicious stuff under that denomination; and the distiller would compound them in such a manner, that it would be impossible to detect the imposition. These reasons were thought sufficient by the majority, and a bill was ordered in for imposing the above duties.

While this bill was depending several petitions were presented to the house by the planters in the sugar colonies, and the merchants of Bristol and Liverpool, representing the hardships to which they should be exposed, by a law which amounted to a prohibition of rum and spirits distilled from molasses. These applications occasioned a mitigating clause in favour of a composition known by the name of punch; and the distillers were permitted to exercise any other employment.

On the twenty-seventh of April his royal highness Frederic, prince of Wales, was married to the princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha. This event filled the nation with joy. The two houses of parliament, the city of London, and almost every county-town and borough in England, expressed their satisfaction in addresses to their majesties; and the prince and princess of Wales.

Among the acts passed this session was one for restraining lands from being disposed of in Mortmain; whereby they became unalienable. This bill took its rise from several incidents that had lately happened, by which heirs at law had suffered considerably by injudicious disposals of their lands to charitable and other uses: it was therefore thought proper to put a stop to so growing an evil. This bill alarmed the two universities of Oxford and Cambridge; and they, as well as the colleges of Eaton, Winchester and Westminster, presented petitions against it. The petition from the university of Cambridge was very particular, setting forth, "That the university and the colleges in it, were founded and endowed for the maintaining fit persons, in the study of useful knowledge, and to bring up youth in learning, virtue and religion; that in general the intention of the founders had been answered. But the petitioners apprehended, that if the bill now depending passed without amendment, it would be attended both in the present and in futurity, with very prejudicial consequences, because it would cut them off from donations to supply present and future deficiencies, or for any other wise or great purposes, how useful or necessary soever they might be thought; and that a considerable part of their revenue arose from annuities and other certain payments, issuing out of lands and other estates, and that many of those payments having been fixed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and still continuing invariably the same, were then by the great fall of money since that time, sunk so far below their original value, as to be insufficient to answer the purposes to which they were designed; and that several headships were under one hundred and twenty pounds, some under a hundred a year, and that the salary of some professors were under fifty pounds a year; and others, as those of botany, anatomy, and chemistry had no endowment at all; and that the income of much the greater part of their fellowships was under sixty pounds, of many under forty pounds, of some so low as thirty, twenty, and fifteen pounds a year; and that many of their scholarships and exhibitions were even under those small sums, and that many poor students had neither scholarship, nor exhibition to help towards their maintenance; and that the number of advowsons in most colleges was very small in proportion to the number of fellows; and therefore praying the house to except that university and the several colleges therein out of the said bill."

The request of all these seats of learning was complied with; but the petitions of the hospitals, and other charitable societies were rejected. Several other amendments were also made to the bill both in the lower and upper house; after which it passed, and received the royal assent.

In this session of parliament the bill for building a bridge cross the river Thames from New Palace-yard to the opposite shore in the county of Surry, was passed into a law. And the structure is now one of the noblest pieces of architecture in any part of the world.

On the twentieth of May his majesty put an end to the session of parliament by a speech, in which he acquainted both houses, "That since the preliminary articles articles had been concluded between his most christian majesty and the emperor, a farther convention concerning the execution of them had been made and communicated to him by both those courts, and that negotiations were carrying on by the several powers engaged in the late war, in order to settle the general pacification." His majesty then expressed his concern with relation to the seeds of dissention that had been sown among his people; exhorted his parliament to cultivate unanimity, and promised impartial protection to all his subjects. He then acquainted them; "that being obliged that summer to visit his German dominions, he hoped they would make the administration of the queen, whom he had resolved to appoint regent in his absence, as easy to her, as her wife conduct would render her government agreeable to them."

A tumult was expected to be the consequence of the gin act's taking place, especially as the common people had lately sufficiently shewn their disposition for riot and disorder. The guards were, therefore, doubled at Kensington, St. James's and Whitehall; a detachment of the life-guards and horse grenadiers patrolled Covent-garden, and places adjacent; but contrary to expectation, every thing remained very quiet, and the act took place without the least disorder.

About the middle of April an incident happened in Scotland, which was attended with very serious consequences. One Wilson, a bold, resolute fellow, had been tried and condemned to be hanged at Edinburgh, for robbing one of the officers of the revenue; and for having afterwards been guilty of one of the most daring actions ever attempted, that of rescuing out of the hands of justice his brother-convict in the time of divine service, when surrounded by his guards. So desperate an offender filled the city of Edinburgh with terror, and the magistrates redoubled their usual precautions for causing the sentence pronounced against this desperate criminal to be executed. This had the desired effect, and Wilson suffered without any disturbance being raised by his friends; but while the executioner was cutting him down from the gallows, he was pelted with dirt and stones by the rabble. Some of the stones, happening to strike Porteous, who commanded the city guards, he gave way to his brutal passion, and ordered his soldiers to fire among the populace. They readily obeyed, and several persons were killed, and others wounded. As this was done without any order from the magistrates, Porteous was tried for murder, convicted on full evidence, and sentenced to be hanged on the eighth of September. The jury, however, by whom he was tried, found in their verdict, "that he and his guards had been attacked and pelted with stones of a considerable size, thrown by the multitude, whereby several of the soldiers were bruised and wounded."

This paliating circumstance, together with the daring insolence of the smugglers, of whom Wilson was the chief, and who were then very numerous at Edinburgh, induced the queen, who was then regent, to indulge Porteous with a respite for six weeks, that a more particular enquiry might be made into the whole transaction. This respite occasioned a very tragical catastrophe. The common people repented in the most outrageous manner, this lenity shewn to a person who was the object of their detestation: they considered it as an attempt to sanctify oppression. The relations and friends of those who had been killed, took every method in their power to increase this hatred in the populace, and a resolution was formed to execute the criminal, and on the very day fixed by the judges for that purpose. Accordingly, about ten o'clock at night, on the seventh of September, a party of men from the adjacent country, entered Edinburgh, surprized the city guard, seized all their fire arms, locked up the gates, and gave the alarm that they were come to revenge innocent blood. They were immediately joined by several thousands the populace, and repaired directly to the prison where Porteous was confined. After several fruitless attempts to force open the door, they set it on fire, dragged the criminal from his apartment, and hanged him upon a dyer's pole near the grafs-market. From the boldness, secrecy and success of this daring enterprise, it was universally believed, that some persons, much above the rank of the vulgar, were concerned in it; especially as they left the arms and drums of the city guard on the spot where they found them, as soon as the execution was over, and departed quietly without offering the least violence to any other person.

The queen highly repented this insult offered to the government; and on enquiring it appeared, that the magistrates of Edinburgh had received intimation the day before of what was to happen, but had neglected to take the necessary precautions to render the attempt abortive. Her majesty complained of this want of respect to her government, and a resolution was taken to make a strict enquiry into the whole proceeding, and to punish the guilty with the utmost severity.

A.D. 1737. The parliament met at Westminster on the first of February, and the session was opened by commission from his majesty. The lord-chancellor acquainted both houses, that a farther convention with regard to the execution of the preliminary articles had been communicated to his majesty by the French and Imperial courts, and that negotiations were then carrying on by the several powers engaged in the late war, in order to settle a general pacification. He added, "That the respective acts of cession being exchanged, and orders issued for the evacuation and possession of the several countries and places by the powers concerned, according to the allotment and disposition of the preliminary articles, the great work of re-establishing the general tranquillity was greatly advanced. But that his majesty was of opinion, that great attention ought to be paid to the final conclusion of the new settlement which was to dispose of such considerable parts of Europe. That though there was the most promising appearance of a general and lasting tranquillity, yet common prudence called upon the British nation to avoid an indolent security and too great a disregard to future events. In short, that the might be provided against all attempts that might be made against her peace by her enemies." He next acquainted the commons, "That his majesty had, as soon as circumstances would admit, made such a reduction of the expences, as was consistent with the peace and safety of his kingdoms, the security of commerce, and the honour and interest of the nation." In the remainder of the speech, the late disturbance at Edinburgh was mentioned in the following manner, "His majesty cannot but observe, that it must be matter of the utmost surprize and concern to every true lover of his country, to see the many contrivances and attempts carried on in various shapes, and in various parts of the nation, tumultuously to resist and obstruct the execution of the laws, and to violate the peace of the kingdom. The disturbers of the public repose, conscious that the interest of his majesty and his people are the same, and of the good harmony which subsists between him and his parliament, have levelled their sedition against both, and, in their late outrages, have either directly opposed, or, at least, attempted to render ineffectual, some acts of the whole legislature. His majesty, in his great wisdom, thinks it affords a melancholy prospect to consider to what height those audacious proceedings may rise."

This speech was answered by very loyal addresses from both houses of parliament. The lords, as forming the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, took particular notice of that part of his majesty's speech, relating to tumults and riots. Lord Carteret observed, that notwithstanding the power with which the civil magistrate was invested, the military force had been employed in supporting the late disturbances, disturbances, none of which, he said, had proceeded from any disaffection to the government, but from very different causes. He represented the murder which had been committed by the populace of Edinburgh, as a crime of the most atrocious nature; adding, that the conspiracy by which it had been effected was the more alarming, as it had not been attended with any of those disorders so common to the tumults of a headstrong and riotous populace; which afforded the greatest reason to believe, that it had been framed and conducted by persons of rank and consequence. His lordship was therefore of opinion, that the house ought to make the most diligent inquiry into this affair, in order to discover the delinquents, and bring them to condign punishment; and even to punish the city of Edinburgh, if it should appear that the inhabitants and magistrates had not exerted their utmost endeavours to suppress the insurrection. He then moved, "That the provost and bailies of Edinburgh, in the year 1736; the person commanding the city guard at the time of the riot, in which captain Porteous was murdered; and the commander in chief of his majesty's forces in Scotland at the time of the said riot, should all of them be ordered to attend the house on a day appointed; and that an humble address should be presented to his majesty, desiring that the different accounts and papers relating to the murder of captain Porteous might be submitted to their inspection."

This motion was agreed to; and the gentlemen being arrived from Scotland, the house entered, with great alacrity, into the enquiry. The persons were all separately examined, but their evidence was confused and unsatisfactory. The house was, however, satisfied from the whole, that the magistrates of Edinburgh had not done their duty in suppressing the riot, though they had no legal evidence to convict them. A bill was therefore brought in for disabling Alexander Wilson, the provost of Edinburgh, from taking, holding, and enjoying any office or place of magistracy in that city, or elsewhere in Great-Britain; and for imposing a fine of two thousand pounds upon the corporation of Edinburgh, for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. This bill occasioned very violent debates in both houses, and was at last passed by a majority of twenty-seven only.

On the twenty-second of February, Mr. Pulteney moved the house of commons, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, to express the just sense of this house of his majesty's great goodness and tender regard for the lasting welfare and happiness of his royal highness the prince of Wales; and as this house cannot omit any opportunity of shewing their zeal and regard for his majesty's honour, and the prosperity of his family, humbly to beseech his majesty, that, in consideration of the high rank and dignity of their royal highnesses, the prince and princess of Wales, and their many eminent virtues and merits, he would be graciously pleased to settle one hundred thousand pounds a year on the prince of Wales, out of the revenues cheerfully granted to his majesty, for the expences of his civil government, and better supporting the dignity of the crown, and for enabling his majesty to make an honourable provision for his royal family, in the same manner his majesty enjoyed it before his happy accession to the throne: and also humbly to beseech his majesty to settle the like jointure upon her royal highness the princess of Wales, as her majesty had when she was princess of Wales; and to assure his majesty, that this house will enable him effectually to perform the same, as nothing will more conduce to the strengthening of his majesty's government, than honourably supporting the dignity of his majesty's government, than honourably supporting the dignity of their royal highnesses, from whom we hope to see a numerous issue, to deliver down the blessings of their reign to the latest posterity."

Sir John Barnard seconded this motion, which was supported by a great variety of instances from the English history, in order to prove that the heirs apparent of the crown always had been provided for in a very independent manner.

Sir Robert Walpole well knew that this motion must occasion a breach in the royal family; and, at the same time, how greatly his own interest was concerned to keep up a good correspondence with the heir apparent, did every thing in his power to prevent the motion being made in the house of commons; but his royal highness rejected all terms of accommodation, but such as should be made by parliament. He therefore entered into the debate with great decency and firmness, by endeavouring to shew, that his majesty could not, out of his present revenue, spare a greater allowance, than he did to his royal highness: and then he told the house,

"That he was commanded by his majesty to acquaint them, that his majesty yesterday sent a message to his royal highness the prince of Wales, by the lord chancellor, lord president, lord steward, lord chamberlain, duke of Richmond, duke of Argyle, duke of Newcastle, earl of Pembroke, earl of Scarborough, and lord Harrington." Which message, so sent by those lords, being in writing, was as follows:

"His majesty has commanded us to acquaint your royal highness, in his name, that, upon your royal highness's marriage, he immediately took into his royal consideration the settling a proper jointure upon the princess of Wales; but his sudden going abroad, and his indisposition since his return, had hitherto retarded the execution of these his gracious intentions; from which short delay his majesty did not apprehend any inconvenience could arise, especially since no application had in any manner been made to him upon this subject by your royal highness; and that his majesty hath now given orders for settling a jointure upon the princess of Wales, as far as he is enabled by law, suitable to her high rank and dignity; which he will, in proper time, lay before his parliament, in order to be rendered certain, and effectually for the benefit of her royal highness."

"The king hath farther commanded us to acquaint your royal highness, that although your royal highness has not thought fit, by any application to his majesty, to desire that your allowance of fifty thousand pounds per annum, which is now paid you by monthly payments, at the choice of your royal highness, preferably to quarterly payments, by his majesty's farther grace and favour, be rendered less precarious; his majesty, to prevent the bad consequences, which he apprehends may follow from the undutiful measures, which his majesty is informed your royal highness has been advised to pursue, will grant to your royal highness, for his majesty's life, the said fifty thousand pounds per annum, to be issued out of his majesty's civil-list revenues, over and above your royal highness's revenues arising from the duchy of Cornwall; which his majesty thinks a very competent allowance, considering his numerous issue, and the great expences which do, and must necessarily attend, an honourable provision for his royal family."

And that to this message his royal highness the prince returned a verbal answer; which, according to the best recollection and remembrance of the lords, was in substance as follows:

"That his royal highness desired the lords to lay him, with all humility, at his majesty's feet; and to assure his majesty, that he had, and ever should retain the utmost duty for his royal person; that his royal highness was very thankful for any instance of his majesty's goodness to him or the princess, and particularly for his majesty's gracious intentions of settling a jointure upon her royal highness; but that, as to the message, the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no answer to it."

After which, his royal highness used many dutiful expressions towards his majesty; and then added, "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands; I am sorry for it;" or to that effect.

His royal highness concluded with earnestly desiring the lords to represent his answer to his majesty in the most respectful and dutiful manner.

This message made various impressions upon the house; and the opposition affected to treat the whole of it as a wicked artifice of the minister to divide the royal family; the better to support his own power. The best speakers in the house interested themselves in this debate; but the question being called for, a negative was put upon it, by a majority of two hundred and thirty-four against two hundred and four.

On the twenty-fifth of February, the same motion was made in the house of peers by lord Carteret; and the duke of Newcastle presented from his majesty the same message that Sir Robert Walpole had delivered to the commons; and a like debate followed; but a negative was put upon the motion by a majority of seventy-nine peers present and twenty-four proxies, against twenty-eight peers present and twelve proxies; upon this a protest was entered by fourteen peers.

His royal highness the prince of Wales having now been prevailed upon to enter, in some measure, into the views of the opposition, it became the general opinion that the minister could not long hold his power. Some other great men, about the same time, began to be uneasy; amongst these was John duke of Argyle, elder brother to the earl of Hay.

The whole of the national debt, as delivered to the house of commons on the eighteenth of March, amounted to forty-seven millions, eight hundred and fifty-five thousand, nine hundred and forty-eight pounds, three shillings and three-pence half-penny; and some gentlemen thinking that the interest paid for it was too great, Sir John Barnard, on the twenty-first of March, moved in the committee of supply, "that his majesty be enabled to raise money, either by sale of annuities for years or lives, at such rates as should be prescribed, or by borrowing at an interest not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming old and new South-sea annuities; and that such of the annuitants as should be inclined to subscribe their respective annuities, should be preferred to all others."

Though this motion, and arguments urged in favour of it, were founded upon undeniable principles of public utility, yet it is incredible what a popular storm was raised amongst the annuitants, who were very numerous, against the friends of the motion. Though the minister was convinced of the justice and expedience of the measure, yet he was very shy of encouraging or giving way to the motion till the public could be brought to a better disposition to bear it. But the arguments in favour of the measure were so forcible, that he was obliged to give way; and on the thirtieth of March, Sir Charles Turner reported from the committee of the whole house, to whom it was referred to consider of the national debt,

"That it is the opinion of the committee, that all the public funds redeemable by law, that carry an interest at four per cent. per annum, be reduced according to the respective provisos or clauses of redemption contained in the acts of parliament for that purpose, or, with consent of the proprietors, be converted into an interest of annuity not exceeding three per cent. per annum, not redeemable till after fourteen years.

"That his majesty be enabled to borrow from any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, any sum or sums of money, at an interest not exceeding three per cent. to be applied towards redeeming the national debt."

Upon reading the first resolution a second time, some friends of the minister moved, that the consideration of the report should be adjourned for a fortnight; but a negative was put upon this motion by a majority of two hundred and twenty against one hundred and fifty-seven. Upon this it was moved, that the resolution should be re-committed; and it was agreed to, as was the second, by the house, without any division.

Though these resolutions had received a form different from what Sir John Barnard originally moved for, yet they were thought to contain a good introduction to the lessening of the national debt; and, upon their being agreed to, Sir John Barnard moved, "That that house would, as soon as the interest of all the national redeemable debt should be reduced to three per cent. per annum, take off some of the heavy taxes which oppress the poor and the manufacturers."

Though this motion was very plausibly introduced and supported, yet it was built upon principles which the generality of the house could not agree to: for it supposed a fact that was denied; that the public taxes fell more heavy upon the poor; and the manufacturers in England, than in any other country; neither did it appear to the satisfaction of gentlemen; that the redeemable part of the national debt, being reduced to pay an interest of only three per cent. could compensate for the losses the government must be at, if the taxes that fell heavy upon the poor and manufacturers, such as soap, candles, leather, and salt, were taken off. But, above all, the motion was deficient in point of form and regularity; because, as no body supposed that the reduction mentioned in the motion could take place that session, and it might happen not to take place even during that parliament, should the house have agreed to it, they must, in effect, have undertaken for a future session, if not for a future parliament. The motion, therefore, after long debates, was thrown out by a majority of two hundred against one hundred and forty-two; for the progress which the reduction of the interest had made, occasioned so great a noise as alarmed the minister, who now found himself obliged to oppose the bill itself.

On the twenty-second of April, Sir John Barnard presented the bill according to order; the second reading was put off till the twenty-ninth, at which time a motion was made for committing it; Sir Robert Walpole publicly declared, "that he had had no hand or concern in the formation of the scheme, either in its original shape, or in that in which it now appeared; and that he never had, either in public or private, any conference with Sir John about that; or any other scheme." Sir John replied pretty smartly to this; and a debate ensued, in which the minister and his friends carried the question against committing the bill, by a majority of two hundred and forty-nine against one hundred and thirty-four. A long debate, as usual, happened upon the number of land-forces to be kept up; but little new matter was offered on either side, excepting that the opposition in both houses charged the disorders and tumults that had lately happened, to the dislike the people had conceived against the numerous army that was kept up, and the great load of taxes they were obliged to pay for maintaining them. The ministerial party, on the other hand, endeavoured to throw all the blame upon the seditious practices of their opposers; and maintained, there was then no safety for any well-wisher to his majesty, but in the neighbourhood of the army, or part of it. The number proposed was continued, by a majority of two hundred and forty-six against one hundred and seventy-eight.

A bill likewise passed this session for restraining the number of playhouses; that had been so lately and so justly complained of; and for subjecting all dramatical performances exhibited on the stage, to a licence from the lord-chamberlain of his majesty's household, before they could be acted.

On the twenty-first of June, his majesty put an end to the session by a speech, in which he mentioned the licentiousness of the times, "which, (said he) under the colour and disguise of liberty, you cannot be insensible what scandal and offence it gives to all honest and sober men, and how absolutely necessary it is to restrain this excessive abuse by a due and vigorous vigorous execution of the laws. Defiance of all authority, contempt of magistracy, and even resistance of the laws, are become too general, although equally prejudicial to the prerogative of the crown and the liberties of the people; the support of the one being inseparable from the protection of the other. I have," continued he, "made the laws of the land the constant rule of my actions; and I do, with reason, expect in return all that submission to my government and authority, which the same laws have made the duty, and shall always be the interest, of my subjects."

The lord chancellor then prorogued the parliament to the fourth of August, and by various subsequent prorogations, to the twenty-fourth of January ensuing.

The domestic events of this important year were various and affecting. A spirit of charity broke out among all ranks of people, and was led on by his royal highness the prince of Wales, who sent, in January, five hundred pounds for releasing poor freemen of London out of prison, where they were confined for debt; and a great number of others were discharged by the charitable donations of one Mr. Wright, a gentleman of great fortune, who died at Newington. A royal infirmary at Edinburgh for the maintenance of the sick, was incorporated by his majesty's charter, and met with great success. About the same time Mr. Oglethorpe returned from Georgia with an account of the promising state of that favourite colony, where the Indians had submitted to his majesty's authority. The Spanish government of Florida, and the council of War residing at St. Augustine, had signed a treaty with the colony; and besides the town of Savannah, which was now in a flourishing state, three other towns, Frederica, Augusta, and Darien, were founded; and a new town called Ebenezer had been built by Salzburghers, who had been obliged to leave their country, not by the persecution of its government, but with regard to civil and religious liberties.

On the other hand, never were the common people known to be so dissolute and turbulent. All the penalties of the law were insufficient for restraining them from the use of pernicious strong liquors, and the examples of justice which were made by the magistrates on that account, were reprieved by the enemies of the government, as so many acts of cruelty and oppression. The truth is, that the law, as it then stood, was a little too severe upon the retailers of spiritous liquors, because it admitted of no alleviation, through accident or inadvertence, of a hundred pounds fine for the smallest quantity sold by retail. This was productive of very bad consequences; for though some of the offenders were able to pay the penalty, yet many more being unable, they became desperate, and betook themselves to unlawful courses of life. Hence it was that executions for robberies and murders of the most shocking kinds, now became frequent; and the government soon perceived, that the severity of the law against drinking spirituous liquors would render it ineffectual.

A. D. 1738. On the fifteenth of January his majesty arrived from Hanover at St. James's, and, in a grand council, which was immediately held, her majesty surrendered to him her commission for being sole guardian of the kingdom in his absence; and on the eighteenth her majesty received the compliments of the city of London.

About this time died Dr. Wake, archbishop of Canterbury. He was a wise and moderate prelate, and had acquired great reputation by his writings against Aterbury, afterwards bishop of Rochester, upon the rights and privileges of the convocation. His successor was Dr. John Potter, bishop of Oxford, whose promotion was obnoxious to no party; and who made a greater figure by his excellent account of the Greek antiquities, than he did by his polemical or theological writings.

Amongst the many irregularities this spring produced, none was more insolent than a conspiracy amongst the footmen in London and Westminster, which went to so daring a height, that notwithstanding the presence of their royal highnesses the prince and princess of Wales and others of the royal family, they attempted by force to possess themselves of a gallery in the playhouse. A great number of people were wounded upon this occasion; and it was with the utmost difficulty that colonel Deveil, the Westminster justice of the peace, assisted by a party of the guards could quell them. This insolence was, in a great measure, owing to the discredit which the magistrates of Westminster had incurred with the lower ranks of people. Most of the acting justices, being men of very small fortunes, sought to encrease them by making a trade of their duty; which being no secret to the commonalty, rendered them very obnoxious.

Sir John Norris, after an effectual expedition, arrived safe from Lisbon at Portsmouth in April. The mediation of his fleet had perfectly re-established a good correspondence between the crowns of Spain and Portugal; and his Portuguese majesty, at taking leave of Sir John, expressed himself in terms the most grateful towards his Britannic majesty, and the English nation. But in proportion as the nation felt the benefit of the seasonable relief sent to the Portuguese, she became sensible of the necessity of breaking with Spain, if his Catholic majesty did not shew more sincerity in the cedulas he dispatched to his governors in America.

The state of Venice, at this time, having shewn great marks of honour and respect to the eldest son of the pretender, their resident at London received orders from court to leave England in three days; which he accordingly did, in company with a messenger of state. The insult was thought to have been committed at the private instigation of the court of Spain.

The princess of Wales, who was advanced to the very last month of her pregnancy, but not thought to be so near her time as she really was, being with their majesties and the rest of the royal family at Hampton-court, but without any midwife attending her, she was, on the thirty-first of July, seized with the pains of child-birth, which increased so violently that the prince, who was with her, was obliged to bring her to London; and was that night delivered of a daughter, the princess Augusta. His majesty, on being acquainted with this unlooked for event, sent a message, by the earl of Essex, to the prince, congratulating him upon the birth of the princess; but at the same time expressing his displeasure at his royal highness's conduct, in carrying away the princess from Hampton-court under the immediate pains of child-birth, to the hazard and danger both of the princess and her child, without acquainting his majesty or the queen with the circumstances the princess was in, or giving them the least notice of his departure, was looked upon by his majesty to be such a deliberate indignity offered to himself and the queen, that he resented it to the highest degree. His royal highness endeavoured to clear himself, by representing the necessity of leaving Hampton-court without delay, considering the condition the princess was in; this he did in two letters, one addressed to his majesty, and the other to the queen, both wrote in a very dutiful strain. He repeated his importunity for a reconciliation, in a very humble message he sent next day, by the marquis of Carnarvon, one of the lords of his bedchamber; to neither of which he received any answer.

The king then sent a message by the earl of Dunmore to the prince of Wales, to acquaint him that it was his majesty's pleasure the baptism of the young princess should be performed on the twenty-ninth, and that he would send his lord-chamberlain to stand as godfather in his place; that the queen's lady of the bedchamber would stand for her majesty as godmother; godmother; and desired the princefs to appoint one of the ladies of her bedchamber to represent the dutchefs-dowager of Saxe-Gotha; as the other godmother; the ceremony to be performed by the archbishop of Canterbury. This message encouraged the prince to repeat again his application for a reconciliation with more earnestness than ever, both to the king and queen; but on the tenth of September following, he received, by the duke of Grafton, a very severe message from the king, reproaching him with his past conduct, and concluding with the following expressions:

"The whole of your conduct, for a considerable time, has been so entirely void of all real duty to me, that I have long had reason to be highly offended with you; and until you withdraw your regard and confidence from those by whose instigation and advice you are directed and encouraged in your unwarrantable behaviour to me and the queen, and until you return to your duty, you shall not reside in my palace, which I will not suffer to be made the resort of them who, under the appearance of an attachment to you, foment the division which you have made in my family, and thereby weaken the common interest of the whole.

"In this situation, I will receive no reply; but when your actions manifest a just sense of your duty and submission, that may induce me to pardon what, at present, I most justly resent. In the mean time, it is my pleasure that you leave St. James's, with all your family, when it can be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princefs. I shall, for the present, leave to the princefs the care of my granddaughter, until a proper time calls upon me to consider of her education."

The prince of Wales paid due obedience to this message, and retired to Kew. He made several new efforts to regain his majesty's favour, but they all proved ineffectual. He ordered lord Baltimore, one of his domestics, to apply to lord Grantham, chamberlain to the queen, to know whether her majesty would receive a letter from him, in mitigation of his conduct; but her majesty declined that. The princefs then wrote an humble letter to the king, which was delivered by the earl of Pembroke. This his majesty answered in terms full of affection and civility to the princefs; but it appeared plainly, that his displeasure towards the prince was rather increased than abated. The guards were now taken off from their attendance on the prince and princefs; and those who paid their court to them were not suffered to come into his majesty's presence.

The letters which passed between the royal family were printed by authority, and made various impressions on the minds of the people. All the prince's servants soon after joined the opposition to ministry.

The Spaniards still continued to commit depredations upon the properties of English subjects in the West-Indies and America. Three very rich ships had been lately taken by their guarda-costas. This fresh insult upon the property of the nation obliged the merchants to address his majesty personally, which was done as follows:

"That the fair and lawful trade of your majesty's subjects to the British plantations in America, hath been greatly interrupted for many years past, not only by their ships having been frequently stopped and searched, but also forcibly and arbitrarily seized on the high seas, by Spanish ships fitted out to cruise, under the plausible pretence of guarding their own coasts: that the commanders thereof, with their crews, have been inhumanly treated, and their ships carried into some of the Spanish ports, and there condemned, with their cargoes, in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns."

"That, notwithstanding the many instances made by your majesty's ministers at the court of Madrid, against this injurious treatment, the late and repeated insults of the Spaniards upon the persons and properties of your majesty's subjects, lay your petitioners under the necessity of applying again to your majesty for relief.

"That by these violent and unjust proceedings of the Spaniards, the trade to your majesty's plantations in America is rendered very precarious; and if any nation is suffered thus to insult the persons of your majesty's subjects, and plunder them of their property, your petitioners apprehend it will be attended with such an obstruction of that valuable branch of commerce, as will be very fatal to the interest of Great-Britain.

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your majesty, that your majesty will be graciously pleased to procure speedy and ample satisfaction to your subjects for the losses they have sustained; and that no British vessel be detained or seized on the high seas by any nation, on any pretext whatsoever; and that the trade to America may be rendered sure for the future, by such means as your majesty, in your great wisdom, shall think fit."

To this petition his majesty returned a most gracious answer; and his secretary of state sent fresh orders to Mr. Keene to repeat his instances, at the court of Madrid, for their relief. A committee of the privy-council sat at Whitehall, and heard the proofs of the losses which the merchants had suffered by the Spaniards.

This year died, greatly lamented, queen Caroline, in the fiftieth year of her age. She had been, for some time, indisposed, and had taken medicines for the gout in her stomach, but her disorder proved to be a concealed rupture. The virtues which adorned this princefs were various and numerous; her conjugal affection was exemplary: the king always found in her a wife and a faithful counsellor; and when she was intrusted, as she frequently was, with the reins of government, the public was happy under her administration. Her natural sagacity and talents were improved by reading and conversing with the most eminent philosophers and authors of the age; and she had made so great a progress in literature, that she became an umpire in one of the most abstruse points of metaphysical reasoning, the doctrine of free-will and fatality, as disputed between Mr. Leibnitz and Dr. Clarke. The ingenious were always sure of a patronage in this amiable princefs; and the bench of bishops, through her means, was filled with prelates eminent for their learning.

The king was prodigiously afflicted, for a length of time, at his irreparable loss; and the public likewise shewed every mark of concern they could testify upon this melancholy occasion.

A war broke out this year between the Turks and the Russians, and between the Turks and the Imperialists. The Russian army was commanded by count Munich, who carried on the campaign with great success. He besieged and took Oczakow, one of the strongest cities in the Turkish dominions, garrisoned by twenty thousand of their best troops. This success, which was, in a great measure, owing to the valour of general Keith, cost the Russians very dear, and disabled Munich from carrying his conquests farther. At the same time, general Lascei, at the head of another Muscovite army, marched towards Precop, with a design to carry the war into Crim Tartary, which he effected.

Though these operations were carried on in concert with the Imperialists, the latter were far from being so successful. The duke of Lorraine had nominally the command of their army; but count Seckendorff, an old man and a protestant, was the acting general. The emperor had given him this command, in compliment to the diet of the empire, by whom he was assisted in the war. The scheme of operations was, that Seckendorff should advance, with the main body of the army, and attack Widin, upon the Danube; but finding that place too advantageously situated to be reduced, without a squadron of ships, he suddenly attacked Nissa, one of the strongest towns upon upon the Turkish frontier, which surrendered. The rest of the campaign on that side was unfortunate for the Imperialists. The excessive heats killed great numbers of their men, and Seckendorff, through the management of the Roman catholic party and the jesuits, had not the proper supplies of either men or money. Being obliged to divide his army, he formed with one part of it the blockade of Widin, which he was forced to abandon with loss. The baron de Raunach, another imperial general, having penetrated, at the head of six thousand men, into Croatia, was entirely routed; and the prince of Saxilburghausen, who had formed the siege of Bagnalac, was defeated by a superior body of Turks, who destroyed the best part of his army, which consisted of fourteen thousand men. These repeated losses threw the court of Vienna into consternation: Seckendorff was ordered home to account for his conduct, and the command was given to velt-marshal Philippi. Notwithstanding those and a great many other important advantages gained by the Turks on the side of Bosnia and Servia, their governor seemed very desirous of a peace; and some conferences on that head had been held at Niemerén; but as the Russians insisted upon keeping possession of Asoph and Oczakow, they proved fruitless; and all parties went into winter quarters.

A.D. 1739. His majesty opened the session of parliament on the twenty-fourth of January. His speech upon that occasion was remarkably short, and exhorted the house to unanimity and dispatch. They, on the other hand, returned him very loyal addresses of condolence upon her majesty's death. The first business of great importance they went upon, was the state of affairs between Great Britain and Spain. His majesty had referred the examination of the complaints of the British merchants to a committee of the privy-council, where they attempted to make good their allegations. Having no one to oppose them, the public unanimously took their part, and every day brought fresh accounts of depredations committed upon British subjects, not only in the American, but in the European seas. The court of Spain did not indeed directly justify all those captures, and to give its proceedings an air of moderation, the crews three English ships which had, upon frivolous pretexts, been taken in the Mediterranean, and imprisoned in Spain, were ordered to be released; and in some flagrant cases in the West Indies, the ships that had been taken, were released, upon the owners giving security for the value, if they should be adjudged to be lawful prizes.

On the third of March a petition was presented to the house of commons from divers merchants, planters, and others, trading to, and interested in the British plantations in America. After recapitulating all that had passed in consequence of former applications of the same kind, the petitioners set forth, "That the Spaniards had paid so little regard to his majesty's most gracious endeavours (to obtain justice to his subjects) that they had continued their depredations, almost ever since the treaty of Seville, and more particularly last year, had carried them to a greater height than ever; they having arbitrarily seized several ships with their effects, belonging to his majesty's subjects, on the high seas, in the destined course of their voyages to and from the British colonies, amounting to a very considerable value; and that the captains or masters of the said ships were, according to the last advices of the petitioners, and are, as the petitioners believe, at this time, confined by the Spaniards in the West Indies, and the crews are now in slavery in Old Spain, where they are most inhumanly treated; and that cruel nation make it their practice to attack and board all British merchant ships they meet with in the American seas, under pretence of searching for goods which they deem contraband, or not according to their own arbitrary will and pleasure, contrary to the law of nations, and in manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns. And that by these unjust and violent proceedings of the Spaniards, the trade and navigation to and from America, is rendered very unsafe and precarious, inasmuch that the insurance from Jamaica has greatly risen on these accounts, only; and that without some speedy and effectual remedy, the American trade and navigation will be, together with the revenue of the crown arising therefrom, greatly diminished, if not entirely lost: and, farther representing to the house, that although his Catholic majesty has stipulated by the treaty of Seville, and by the declaration of 1732, relative thereto, to cause reparation to be forthwith made to the unhappy sufferers, yet there is no instance of its having been done; so far from it, that whilst the British subjects have been amused with vain and fruitless hopes of satisfaction, the Spaniards have committed farther insults and depredations upon them, and still continue the same unjust practices; and that the cedulas or orders given by the court of Spain to their governors in America, are only calculated, as the petitioners, by experience, have reason to apprehend, to evade giving satisfaction to the British subjects; for there has never been one of those cedulas complied with; nor any governor recalled or punished for his disobedience, as the petitioners ever heard: and that for any nation to assume the power of detaining or rummaging the British ships, upon their lawful voyages on the American seas, is, in effect, the petitioners conceive, claiming and exercising the sole sovereignty of those seas: and that if the Spaniards be suffered to act in this injurious manner, to insult the persons of his majesty's subjects, or to plunder them of their property, the petitioners apprehend the same will be attended not only with a great obstruction to this valuable branch of our commerce and navigation; but also with consequences very fatal to Great Britain itself: and therefore as the measures hitherto pursued have proved ineffectual, praying the house to take the premises into their mature consideration, and provide such timely and adequate remedy for putting an end to all insults and depredations on the British subjects, as to the house shall seem meet, as well as procure such relief for the unhappy sufferers, as the nature of their loss, and the justice of their cause, require, and that they may be heard, by themselves and council thereupon."

This petition was referred to a committee of the whole house, as was another petition to the same effect, presented on behalf of the master, wardens, assistants, and commonalty of the society of merchant adventurers within the city of Bristol. On the same day, a petition upon a particular case was laid before the house, and made great noise: it was from the owner of the ship Ann Galley, which was taken in a time of profound peace, bound from Guinea to Jamaica. This capture, which the owner said was in value ten thousand five hundred pounds, was so flagitious, that the Spanish ministry frequently ordered reparation to be made to the petitioners, and they actually received upwards of five hundred pounds from the Spanish chest at St. Jago, by way of compensation. But that not being near the value of their damages, though the Spanish ministry had admitted the capture to be illegal, and had even ordered full satisfaction to be made to the owners, they therefore brought their petition for relief. Another petition of the same kind was presented at the same time, and all of them were referred to the same committee.

It was then moved "to address his majesty for copies of the several petitions, representations, and memorials; and all other papers relating to the Spanish depredations upon the British subjects, which had been presented to his majesty, or had been delivered to either of the secretaries of state since the first of September last; with copies of such representations or memorials as had been made either to the king of Spain or his ministers; and of the letters written to his majesty's minister at Madrid; and of the answers that have been given or received to such memorials, representations, and letters."

The substance of this motion was not opposed by the minister; but he thought that complying entirely with it might discover particulars, of which a bad use might be made: he therefore insisted upon not addressing for the answers that had been given or received to such memorials, representations, and letters. This brought on a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameness of the English ministry, were equally exaggerated. The chief speakers on both sides exerted themselves upon this occasion; but the minister adhered to his point, that as affairs were then situated, it would be imprudent to plunge the nation into a war, without trying whether it was possible to bring Spain to terms, of which there was then great probability. All that the opposition urged, with any appearance of truth, was admitted of by the minister, who was more frank on this head than some of his friends; for they were apt to throw out reflections against the smuggling trade, which the subjects of Great-Britain carried on in the West-Indies, contrary to treaties. The opposition immediately turned this into a reflection upon the whole body of the British merchants in America, and were always ready to give the most shocking instances of the cruelties of the Spaniards against the English; and that they were of such a nature, as, in fact, admitted of no farther treaty. Some of them went even so far as to say, that the motion was so fair and constitutional, that it was not safe for the minister to oppose it.

Sir Robert Walpole owned, with great candour, that the last answer which had come from the Spanish ministry, was so far from being satisfactory, that if the house should see it, and if (as it unavoidably must) it should come to the knowledge of the public, very bad consequences must follow. The parliament and nation, unacquainted with the reasons which his majesty and his ministry might have for avoiding a precipitate war, would press it; and his majesty must either comply, contrary to the true interests of his people, or he must disagreeably exercise that part of his prerogative, which vests him with the power of making war or peace. He intreated the gentlemen to consider, that even though the present motion was carried without any amendment, it was in his majesty's breast to comply, or not to comply with it; and if the house should address for a paper or papers, which his majesty and his ministry were conscious ought not to be made public, they must lay his majesty under the hardship of refusing it. He acquainted them, that the British ministry, notwithstanding the harshness of the last answer from Spain, had sent to that court some propositions which might soften them, and which, in all probability, would soon be answered. If they were not answered to the satisfaction of his majesty, he himself would move, that every paper relating to Spain, even their last answer, should be laid before the house; but that, till then, it would be highly improper to comply with the motion. He next made a recapitulation of the late treaties and transactions between England and Spain; and he endeavoured to prove, that the stiffness of the Spaniards was owing to the perplexed state of affairs in Europe since the treaty of Seville, which did not admit of the meeting of the commissaries for adjusting the pretensions on both sides, so as to make a final report of their commission. He observed, that the sentiments of certain gentlemen against the Spaniards, since that time, were greatly altered; and that the claims which the English had upon them were far from being looked upon, either at home or abroad, to be so clear as they were then represented, which appears by their being referred to a congress. He next attempted to shew, that the Spaniards had hitherto done as much to satisfy the English sufferers as could be well expected. The distance between Madrid and the Spanish West-Indies, from whence the proofs must be brought, was very great. The Spanish governors were extremely insolent, and, in some measure, arbitrary, and independent upon the ministry; so that it was no wonder if that court sometimes found difficulty in bringing them to reason. He even gave instances of some English ships that had been absolutely released by the Spaniards; of others, that had been released, upon giving security to stand trial whether they had been engaged in an illicit trade or not; and he mentioned others, that the court of Madrid seemed very well disposed towards satisfying their claims; and, to conclude, he was for annexing the question that had been moved for.

Sir William Wyndham, and the other heads of the opposition, were sensible of the advantages they had in an argument which had so highly enflamed the passions of the nation. They perceived the minister aimed at fixing the retrospect of the Spanish depredations no farther back than the treaty of Seville; but they observed, that the causes of complaints had existed for these twenty years; and that little or no redress having yet been obtained, the house ought, for the honour and interest of the nation, to be informed of the reasons, which they could not be without complying with the motion in its full extent: that the public and sufferers had a right to all the satisfaction which the house could give them; and if they could give them none upon the Spaniards, they ought at least to know who were the authors of their calamities at home, by a timid, disgraceful conduct, in so long delaying to repress force with force.

The minister's speech had a great effect upon the house, and he carried the question by a majority of one hundred and sixty-four against ninety-nine.

Mr. Pulteney then made a motion in the house of commons for leave to bring in a bill "for the more effectually securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's subjects in America. In order to introduce this motion, he moved, that the sixth and eighth sections of an act passed in the sixth of queen Anne, intituled, An act for the better securing the trade of the kingdom by cruizers and convoys, should be read; and likewise the second section of an act made in the same session, intituled, An act for the encouragement of the trade to America. It was upon these two bills that the substance of this act moved for was founded, and both of them were thought necessary at the time they passed. The intention of the act now proposed, was to give the property of all prizes taken from the Spaniards after the declaration of war, to the officers and seamen present in the action. Head-money of five pounds for every Spaniard taken at sea, was likewise granted to the sailors; and the property of all places taken from the Spaniards, was to be vested, by his majesty's patent, in the captors.

Little opposition was made to this bill when it was first proposed; but when a motion was made for a second reading, it was strongly opposed by Sir Robert Walpole. He observed, that with regard to the first article, if hostilities were immediately to commence against Spain, and a squadron of English ships of war was to take the whole Plate fleet or flotilla of the Spaniards, with all their register ships, every shilling of it must become the property of the English seamen, though it was publicly known that not one fifth part of that treasure belonged to the Spaniards, but was the property of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe. As to the granting head-money for every Spaniard taken at open sea, he approved of very much, as soon as war should be declared. The third article he thought of a very dangerous nature; and that, if it passed into an act, it must effectually preclude the concluding any safe and honourable peace; because, in all negotiations of peace, some places on both sides are commonly given up to facilitate it, which could not be done if his majesty, by letters patent, should part with the property to private owners.

He then urged with great energy, that, should the act in question immediately take place, without being greatly amended, it must be attended with the absolute ruin of the British commerce all over Europe. It must give an alarm to the French for their property, which is greater than that of the Spaniards themselves on board their American fleets; and that the French court, in such a case, would not hesitate to take part with Spain, and join her with all her naval force to convoy the Spanish plate fleet to Europe; besides, most of the French, the Dutch, and the Danish property at sea, were insured in England or Holland in time of peace, and therefore the loss, in fact, must fall upon the British and Dutch insurers, as they could have no pretext to indemnify the French and other nations for the losses they would sustain; so that the bill, if passed into a law, might ruin the Dutch as well as the British insurers. He desired the house to consider, in such an event, what must be the case of the British merchants then residing in Spain, their persons, their ships, and their properties, all which the Spaniards would certainly sequester. "What must the Dutch," said he, "think of such a bill? or what power in Europe can be our hearty friend, should it, at this time, pass into a law?"

In answer to those who insinuated, that he was afraid of a war because peace was his only safety, he said, "It was but a mean excuse for a minister when any wrong step is made in government, that he is not accountable for the events of measures that never were advised by him, and in which he was over-ruled by his superiors. I have always disdained those mean subterfuges; and with what face can I appear again in this house, if full and ample satisfaction is not made us, or, at least, if we do not do our utmost to obtain it; either by fair and peaceable means, or by exerting all our strength in case a war becomes necessary." If my country should call me to account, I would willingly take upon me the blame of every step that has been made by the government, since I had the honour to enter into the administration. As to the common notion of a minister being afraid to enter upon a war, I do not understand upon what it can be grounded. For my part, I never could see any cause, either from reason or my own experience, to imagine a minister is not as safe in time of war as in time of peace. Nay, Sir, if we are to judge by reason alone, it is the interest of a minister, conscious of any mismanagement, that there should be a war; because by a war, the eyes of the public are diverted from examining into his conduct; nor is he accountable for the bad success of a war, as he is for that of an administration."

The ministry were now endeavouring to get a decisive answer from the court of Spain, but not being able to obtain one, the examinations and enquiries about depredations went on with more fury than ever in both houses of parliament. Mr. Pulteney at last brought into the house of commons, which he moved for in a speech, the following set of resolutions.

"That it is the natural and undoubted right of the British subjects to sail with their ships on any part of the seas of America; to and from any part of his majesty's dominions; and that seizing and confiscating such ships as are not sailing and trafficking in the ports and havens, which have fortifications, castles, magazines, or warehouses, or other places possessed by the king of Spain, is contrary to equity and justice, and a manifest violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns. That it is the indisputable right of the subjects of Great Britain to carry in their ships all sorts of goods, merchandize, or effects, from one part of the British dominions to any other part of the British dominions; and that no goods or merchandize being so carried, are, by the laws of nations, or any treaty between the two crowns, to be deemed or taken as contraband goods; and that the searching of such ships on the open seas, under pretence of finding contraband goods, is highly injurious to the trade of this kingdom, a violation of the law of nations, and an infraction of the treaty subsisting between the two crowns. That the subjects of Great Britain did hold and possess lands in the province of Jucantan in America, antecedent to, and at the time of the treaty of 1670; which treaty confirmed the right to each contracting party of such lands or places as either did at that time hold and possess; and that the subjects of Great Britain then had, and have at all times since, claimed a right of cutting logwood in the bay of Campeachy, and enjoyed the same, without interruption, till of late years; which right seems further particularly secured to us by the manner in which the first article of the treaty of 1670, with those remarkable words, "Without prejudice to any liberty or power which the subjects of Great Britain enjoyed either through right, sufferance, or indulgence." That the attacking a fleet of British ships gathering salt in the island of Tortugas, then under convoy of one of his majesty's ships of war, by two men of war belonging to the king of Spain, was a notorious infraction of the convention signed at Madrid December 14, 1715, and an high insult on the honour due to the flag of Great Britain. That for many years last past, the liberty of navigation in the American seas hath been unjustly disturbed by the Spaniards, under pretence of searching for, and finding, illicit trade; the British ships unlawfully seized, upon the open seas, plundered and confiscated; the sailors robbed, inhumanly tortured, imprisoned and made slaves; to the grievous loss of the merchants, the obstruction of the commerce, and the dishonour of the nation. That, notwithstanding the repeated application of parliament, the treaty of Seville, and the assurances so frequently given to merchants of procuring reparation for their losses and ill usage; and notwithstanding the expectation of the nation of receiving just and ample satisfaction for the cruelties exercised on its subjects, and the insults offered to itself, nothing has in so many years been obtained from the court of Spain effectually to satisfy the losses, repair the injuries, or retrieve the honour of the nation; though the said treaty of Seville, so advantageous to Spain, hath been punctually executed on the part of Great Britain."

Sir Robert Walpole told the house that he was very ready to agree to the first part of the resolution, upon the natural and undoubted right which the subjects had to sail with their ships in any part of the seas of America, to and from any part of his majesty's dominions. He observed, that considering the state of the negotiation between Spain and England at that time, it would be much more eligible to make the resolutions the house agreed to, not quite so peremptory and so particular. He therefore proposed that the rest of the resolutions should run as follows:

"That the freedom of navigation and commerce, which the subjects of Great Britain have an undoubted right to by the law of nations, and which is not in the least restrained by any of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, has been greatly interrupted by the Spaniards, under pretences altogether groundless and unjust. That before and since the execution of the treaty of Seville, that the declaration made by the crown of Spain pursuant thereto, for the satisfaction and security of the commerce of Great Britain, many unjust seizures and captures have been made, and great depredations committed by the Spaniards, which have been attended with many instances of unheard of cruelty and barbarity. That the frequent application made to the court of Spain, for procuring justice and satisfaction to his majesty's injured subjects, for bringing the offenders to condign punishment, and for preventing the like abuses for the future, have proved vain and ineffectual; and the several orders or cedulas, granted by the king of Spain for restitution and reparation of the great losses sustained, by the unlawful and unwarrantable seizures and captures made by the the Spaniards, have been disobeyed by the Spanish governors, or totally evaded and eluded. And that these violences and depredations have been carried on to the great loss and damage of the subjects of Great Britain trading to America, and in direct violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns."

These amendments occasioned great debates, but the minister and his friends maintained, that the resolutions moved by him, contained all that could be reasonably expected from Spain at that time; and with regard either to possession or navigation, it could not be effected or weakened by the house agreeing to the amendment; which the house, after a long debate, complied with, upon a division of two hundred and twenty-four, against one hundred and sixty-three, and an address to be presented by the whole house was accordingly voted.

During this period the lords were no less anxious than the commons, in their enquiries into these important affairs. The earl of Cholmondeley had prepared a set of resolutions, which had a much greater tendency to obtain satisfaction to the nation, than those debated in the house of commons. Lord Carteret, in a very fine speech, shewed, that after the conclusion of the American treaty in 1670, none of the articles in 1667 are applicable to the American navigation by the English and Spaniards. He made a deduction as far back as the peace of Munster, to shew that the basis of all European commerce in America consisted in each nation reserving to itself an exclusive right to trade with its own colonies and plantations there; and that therefore, no ship which was not actually in the ports and harbours of Spain, could be supposed either searchable or seizable by the Spaniards. He proved, beyond a doubt, that all the modes of visiting and searching mentioned and prescribed by the treaty of 1667, was applicable to the European navigation alone, and not to the American; "because," said he, "that very treaty takes it for granted, that no trade between the Spaniards and the English can be carried on there, and consequently there can be no object of search, unless the ships of one power shall be found actually trading within the ports and harbours of the other." As to the claim the Spaniards made of stopping ships within a certain space from the shore, he demonstrated to be unjust and groundless; because, in a coast so extensive, so uncertain, and so little known as that of America, it was often impossible for British subjects to navigate their ships, so as to prevent their being sometimes forced by squalls and currents, and sometimes to know in what part of the world they were, to prevent their making land, and often coming within the distance which the Spaniards pretended gave them a right to seize them. His lordship enforced his arguments with so much clearness, that they agreed to present the following address:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"We, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, having taken into our serious consideration, the many unjust violences and depredations committed by the Spaniards, upon the persons, ships and effects of your majesty's subjects in America, have come to the following resolutions, which we beg, in the humblest manner, to lay before your majesty for your royal consideration, viz.

I. "Resolved that the subjects of Great Britain have a clear and undoubted right to navigate in the American seas, to and from any part of his majesty's dominions; and for carrying on such trade and commerce, as they are justly entitled to in America; and also to carry all sorts of goods, merchandizes, and effects from one part of his majesty's dominions to any other part thereof; and that no goods being so carried, are, by any treaty subsisting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the searching of such ships on the open seas, under pretence of their carrying prohibited or contraband goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns.

II. "Resolved, that it appears to this house, as well before as since the treaty of Seville, on the part of Great Britain, divers ships and vessels with their cargoes belonging to the British subjects, have been violently seized and confiscated by the Spaniards, upon pretences altogether unjust and groundless; and that many of the sailors on board such ships have been injuriously and barbarously imprisoned and ill treated; and that thereby the liberty of navigation and commerce belonging to his majesty's subjects, by the law of nations, and by virtue of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain, hath been unwarrantably infringed and interrupted, to the great loss and damage of our merchants; and in direct violation of the said treaties.

III. "Resolved, that it appears to this house, that frequent applications have been made on the part of his majesty to the court of Spain, in a manner the most agreeable to treaties, and to the peace and friendship subsisting between the two crowns, for redressing the notorious abuses and grievances before mentioned, and preventing the like for the future, and for obtaining adequate satisfaction to his injured subjects, which in the event have proved entirely fruitless and of no effect.

"We think it our duty, on this important occasion, humbly to represent to your majesty, that we are most sensibly affected with the many and grievous injuries and losses, sustained by your majesty's trading subjects, by means of these unwarrantable depredations and seizures; and to give your majesty the strongest and most sincere assurances, that in case your friendly and powerful instances for procuring restitution and reparation to your injured subjects, and for the future security of their trade and navigation, shall fail of having their due effect and influence in the court of Spain, and shall not be able to obtain that great satisfaction and security which your majesty may in justice expect; we will zealously and cheerfully concur in all such measures, as shall become necessary for the support of your majesty's honour; the preservation of our navigation and commerce, and the common good of these kingdoms."

His majesty returned the following answer:

"My lords,

"I am sensibly touched with the many hardships and injuries sustained by my trading subjects in America, from the cruelties and unjust depredations of the Spaniards. You may be assured of my care to procure satisfaction and reparation for the losses they have already suffered, and security for the freedom of navigation for the future; and to maintain to my people the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they are entitled by treaty and the law of nations.

"I doubt not but I shall have your concurrence for the support of such measures, as may be necessary for that purpose."

This important question between Spain and England, so entirely employed the attention of the public, that very little regard was paid to other affairs, which happened in the course of this session, though some of them were of importance. Two millions were granted to his majesty, for the service of the current year, and for paying to the governor and company of the bank of England one million for redeeming an annuity of forty thousand pounds payable to them. Another act of great importance that passed this session was, for building a bridge cross the river Thames, from the Woolstackle, Westminster, to the opposite shore in Surry. Some farther regulations were likewise made with regard to the drinking spirituous liquors; and those already made having been found ineffectual, and productive of many perjuries, a power had been granted to retail spirituous liquors with licences. But this had rather increased than diminished the disorder complained of; and an act passed passed this session, by which a penalty was laid on all occupiers of houses in which spirituous liquors were illegally sold.

On the fourteenth of June, the king came to the house, and put put an end to the session in a speech, wherein he earnestly recommended unanimity among the members, and desired them to transmit, by their example, peace throughout their different counties.

Great pains had been taken to conceal from the people the state of our connections with Spain, but the continual depredations committed upon our trading vessels in different parts of America, alarmed the whole nation, and a war seemed inevitable. Mr. Keene, our ambassador at Madrid, delivered a remonstrance to the Spanish ministry, complaining of the conduct of their naval officers, and demanding restitution of such goods as had been seized from the British subjects. Great augmentations were made to our land forces, by raising ten new regiments, and filling up such as had been reduced. Nor was the navy neglected; for many ships that had been laid up were put in commission, and there was an exceeding hot press for sailors in all the sea-port towns in the kingdom. Orders were sent to admiral Brown, then stationed at Jamaica, to make reprisals on the Spaniards, and every thing seemed to wear a promising appearance, and the nation in general was satisfied.

The sources from whence the Spaniards derive their wealth, became an object of national concern to Great Britain; and therefore it was proposed that two squadrons should be fitted out, one under the command of captain Cornwall, and another under captain Anson. That under captain Cornwall was to sail round Cape Horn, into the South Seas, in order to attack such of the Spanish settlements as lay near the coast; but if he found that impracticable, he was to sail to the Manila, one of the Phillippine islands. Captain Anson was to sail to Java-head; a promontory in the East-Indies, where he was to take in fresh water, with such other necessities as his squadron should want, and then to proceed on his voyage to meet captain Cornwall at Manilla. This scheme was so agreeable to all ranks of people in the nation, that harmony began to take place of discord, and all seemed united to contribute towards distressing the common enemy.

But still it was necessary that a much more respectable squadron than either of those already mentioned should be fitted out; and accordingly nine ships of the line, with several smaller ones, were ordered to sail for the West-Indies, under the command of admiral Vernon, an officer of consummate knowledge, undaunted courage, and great prudence. He was strongly attached to the interests of his country; he had distinguished himself in the house of commons against some schemes of the ministry; but no sooner did he consider the nation in danger, than he forgot every thing like discontent, and cheerfully took upon him the command of the squadron.

Every preparation for war, by both powers, then only wanted the form of a declaration, and that took place on the nineteenth of October. This measure was in its own nature absolutely necessary, for both the honour and interest of the nation were at stake. Our merchants had been plundered of their most valuable goods, and so pusillanimous were our ministry, that the British flag seemed falling into disgrace. Complaints, indeed, had been often made to the ministry, but the persons injured were either refused redress, or dismissed with ambiguous promises. But the declaration of war gave new hopes to the people, and although they knew it had not been done till absolutely necessary, yet they began to have some confidence in the ministry.

Soon after the declaration of war, admiral Hadcock took a rich Spanish ship; but the Spanish admiral, who commanded the squadron, returning from the South Seas, having received notice, or rather suspecting that some of our ships of war would attempt to intercept him off Cadiz, he sailed north round Ireland, and from thence coasting by the Land's-end of England, arrived safe in Spain; to the great mortification of the English sailors, who expected to acquire an immense booty.

It was the opinion of most people in general, that the French would take part with the Spaniards, and such was the conduct of the states-general, that no confidence could be placed even in their most solemn protestations. Mr. Walpole, our ambassador at the Hague, endeavoured to persuade them to take part with us, as their natural ally, but he received only evasive answers; from which it seemed evident that they intended to remain neuter till their own territories should be attacked. With respect to the Spaniards, they were filled with consternation when they found what preparations we were making against them, for the timid behaviour of our ministry had induced them to look upon the people of England as divested of that courage for which they had been so long distinguished.

On the continent, the emperor of Germany, Charles VI. in consequence of some losses, found himself under the necessity of concluding a treaty of peace with the Turks, upon terms neither honourable nor advantageous. The empress of Russia, whose forces acted in concert with those of the emperor, was obliged to follow his example, and recall her army without having obtained any singular advantages.

On the fifteenth of November the British parliament met, and the king in his speech informed them, that contrary to his own inclination, but consistent with the dignity of his crown, and the interest of his subjects, he had declared war against Spain, not doubting but the commons would cheerfully contribute such sums as were wanting to maintain the army and the navy. Both houses were so well pleased with his majesty's speech, that most loyal addresses were presented to him; and the commons declared that nothing should be wanting to defray every necessary expence. And that a complete triumph might be obtained over the ministry, Sir William Wyndham moved, that an address might be presented to his majesty, praying that no treaty of peace should be entered into with Spain, till the British sovereignty was acknowledged in America.

The ministry were so well convinced of the reasonableness and popularity of the motion, that they made no opposition to it; and his majesty, in answer to the commons, told them, that they might depend upon his steady perseverance in rejecting all terms of a dishonourable nature. Some very popular acts passed at this time, though not without opposition from the ministry, who seemed to have nothing so much at heart as that of crossing every measure that seemed productive of public good. Great encouragement was given to foreign seamen to enter into our merchants service; and some thousands of the persecuted protestants in Germany, were invited by our government to settle in America.

Lord Polworth, now earl of Marchmont, proposed, that in compassion to the people already burthened with very heavy taxes, no unnecessary officers should be retained in the army; and although nothing could be more just or equitable, yet the ministry opposed it for this reason, that it threatened to deprive them of the privilege of rewarding their favourites.

A.D. 1740. The commons ordered the proper estimates for the support of the army and navy to be laid before them, but scarce had they taken them into consideration, when Sir Robert Walpole, as chancellor of the exchequer, presented to the house a message from his majesty, intimating that he had some things under consideration of the utmost importance, that would be attended with greater expence than he imagined, and therefore prayed that such sums as were necessary should be granted. This was referred to the committee of supply, and the whole was granted with very little opposition.

The next thing that engaged the attention of the house, was a bill brought in by Sir Charles Wager, for for taking an exact number of all seamen in the merchants service, together with such as plied on the river. But however necessary such a step might be, in order to know the internal strength of the nation, yet the popular party treated it as a measure that would, in the end, enslave the people, and therefore the bill was rejected by a very great majority. The whole conduct of the antiministerial party, on this occasion, shewed that they acted from motives of opposition, because the bill had not originated from themselves.

His majesty sent a message to the house, informing them that he intended to marry his daughter, the princess Mary, to the prince of Hesse-Cassel; and prayed that they would enable him to give her a portion suitable to her rank. The commons unanimously agreed to give the princess forty thousand pounds; and, at the same time, agreed, that an address of thanks should be presented to his majesty, for having communicated to them his royal intention.

The beginning of this year was remarkable for one of the severest frosts that had been known. It began on Christmas-day 1739, and continued, without intermission, upwards of seven weeks. The Thames was frozen over in such a manner, that a public fair was held on it, and booths erected for the reception of all those whose curiosity led them thither. The hardships of the poor were extremely great; but, to the everlasting honour of the English, let it be recorded, that they did every thing in their power to alleviate the distresses of their suffering fellow-subjects. From the king, down to the humble tradesman, each seemed anxious to be most forward in acts of benevolence; so that a national calamity revived decaying charity.

His majesty, on the twenty-fifth of April, went to the house of peers, and, in a speech from the throne, thanked the commons for their readiness in granting the supplies; and recommended unanimity, as the only sure means of making them formidable to their enemies. He added, that the justice of his cause in taking up arms, gave him reason to hope for the divine blessing; after which the parliament was prorogued to the third of June.

The king set out for Hanover in the beginning of May; and during his absence, the princess Mary was married, by proxy, to the prince of Hesse-Cassel. John, duke of Argyle, being offended with some of the measures of government, resigned all his places, and retired to live in a private manner. But it is now necessary that we should look back to the state of the war.

Admiral Vernon having sailed from Portsmouth, came to an anchor at Port-Royal in Jamaica; and sent an account of his business to Mr. Trelawney, the governor, desiring him to grant him all the assistance he could; and, at the same time, promising, that nothing should be wanting on his part to discharge his duty according to the nature of his instructions. At Port-Royal the admiral was joined by commodore Brown, with one ship only; and having procured intelligence that the Spanish fleet intended sailing towards Porto Bello, he resolved, if possible, to be there before them. The fleet under admiral Vernon, with which he proposed taking Porto Bello, consisted of six ships only, having on board two thousand four hundred and ninety-five seamen, and two hundred land forces.

Porto Bello is situated on the isthmus of Darien, where a small track of land divides North and South America from each other. It consists of several strong forts, and is the place to which all the riches of Mexico and Peru are annually brought. The Spaniards had been at great expence in making additions to the fortifications, and they even imagined that it was impregnable. One battery of guns, level with the surface of the water, seemed to threaten destruction to every ship that approached; but abilities, courage, and perseverance, overcome the greatest difficulties.

On the twenty-first of October 1739, the squadron came up to the fort; but the wind being easterly, little could be done besides attacking the Iron Castle, near the mouth of the harbour.

The attack was begun by commodore Brown, in the Hampton-Court, of seventy guns; and in the space of twenty-five minutes, four hundred shot were fired. Such an incessant fire, which was seconded by captain Mayne, in the Worcester, obliged many of the Spaniards to retire from different parts of the fort: upon which the admiral made the signal for the boats to come up, in order to land the marines, which was done with the loss of three men only. As the courage of seamen and soldiers never shines with more lustre than when opposed by the enemy, and exposed to the greatest dangers; so no sooner had they landed, than they scaled the walls by one man's standing on the shoulders of another. This struck such terror into the Spaniards, that both officers and men fled from the lower forts into the uppermost part of the citadel, where they hung out a white flag, as a signal that they would capitulate. The marines and seamen, who had first landed, were so impatient to obtain the victory, that striking down the Spanish colours, they hoisted those of Britain; while such of the Spanish soldiers as beheld their courage, surrendered prisoners at discretion. Two Spanish men of war lying in the harbour surrendered at the same time; so that, in the space of one day, this great fort was taken.

News of this important event was brought to England by captain Renton on the thirteenth of March 1740, while the parliament was sitting; and so much elevated were the people in general, that medals of all sorts were struck, and great rejoicings made throughout the kingdom.

Having forced the governor of Panama to deliver up such of the English as had been illegally confined, the admiral set sail for Jamaica, where he came to an anchor in the harbour of Port-Royal, though not without great damage to his ship, which had been attacked by a violent storm.

While admiral Vernon was supporting the honour and interest of his country in the West-Indies, admiral Haddock, after cruising some time in the Mediterranean, blocked up the Spanish fleet in the harbour of Cadiz. But here admiral Haddock was led into a snare; for another Spanish fleet, under the command of admiral Pintado, made a feint, as if they intended sailing towards Minorca; and Haddock leaving his station to oppose them, the Spanish fleet got out of the harbour of Cadiz, and joined another squadron then lying in the harbour of Ferrol.

The French, who had hitherto concealed their intentions, began to pull off the mask; for they fitted out a strong squadron, under the command of the marquis D'Antin, which sailed to Martinico, with positive orders to act offensively against the English. Indeed our valuable settlements in America had long been an object of envy to our haughty neighbours; and therefore it was resolved that, in concert with Spain, we should be deprived of all the benefits of trade in that part of the world.

No sooner was the news made public, that the French had fitted out a squadron, than our ministry, who had no suspicion of any such intentions, were perplexed in their minds; while the nation was filled with discontent from the one end to the other.

The ministry, in order to quiet the discontents of the people, ordered a large squadron of ships of the line to rendezvous at Spithead, under the command of Sir John Norris, who hoisted his flag on board the Victory, a ship carrying one hundred and ten guns. The late duke of Cumberland went as a volunteer along with the admiral, and great hopes were formed by the people concerning the success of this armament, but all in vain; for after cruising some time, and meeting with storms, Sir John came to an anchor at Spithead, without having done any thing besides amusing the people, who had so generously submitted to very heavy taxes towards supporting the war. This was the most unpopular measure that could have been taken; and the ministry, in order to regain their lost credit, resolved to fit out a squadron under captain Anson; for the scheme projected the former year, of sending him and captain Cornwall to the South-seas, had been partly laid aside.

Mr. Anson, now made commodore, was ordered to sail, with the following ships under his command, namely, the Centurion, of sixty guns; the Severn and Gloucester, of fifty guns each; the Pearl, of forty; and the Wager, of twenty-eight; with the Trial sloop, carrying eight guns; and two victualling vessels. This scheme was well projected; and although it did not, in every thing, answer the hopes that had been formed of it; yet, in the end, the commodore received immortal honour, and riches were brought into the nation. His orders were to sail to the South-seas, and distress the Spaniards in their remote settlements, so as to prevent them from opposing admiral Vernon, who still remained as commander in chief in the West-Indies.

On the twenty-first of October, this small squadron arrived at Madeira, where they took fresh provisions, and then passed Cape Horn, though not without considerable loss; for many of the seamen died, while others were confined to their hammocks in a most sickly condition.

In the mean time, admiral Torres, who commanded the Spanish fleet in the bay of Ferrol, sailed for America, with two thousand land forces on board; which struck such a panic into the English ministry, that they saw no appearance of keeping their ground, unless a fleet was sent to reinforce the squadron under admiral Vernon. That brave commander, upon his return to Port-Royal, having refitted his ships, and taken in fresh provisions, sailed for Carthagea, which he bombarded, and did considerable damage to the place; but not having sufficient force, and many of the men being sickly, he was obliged to return to Porto Bello, where having again refitted, he attacked fort Chagre, and obliged the garrison to capitulate. In the letters sent to the ministry by admiral Vernon, he complained that necessary reinforcements had not been sent him in proper time, so that no beneficial consequences could arise from his victories; and however secret these letters were kept; yet the contents of them transpired, and the nation was again filled with discontent.

This induced, or rather forced, the ministry to send over to the admiral six regiments of marines, with two of foot, the whole under the command of lord Cathcart, a nobleman of great courage and resolution. Sir Chaloner Ogle was ordered to sail from Spithead with twenty-one ships of the line, besides frigates and fire-ships, having on board twelve thousand seamen, furnished with every thing necessary to distress the enemy. But notwithstanding all these preparations, carried on at a great expence, yet the fleet did not sail till October; so that the Spaniards had time to put their forts in a proper state of defence.

This year Charles VI. emperor of Germany, paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded by his daughter Maria Theresa, who had some years before married the grand duke of Tuscany, of the house of Lorrain. The king of Prussia died much about the same time, and his death was succeeded by that of the Czarina Anne Iwanowna, empress of Russia. The death of so many sovereigns could not fail of being attended with such consequences as must always happen on similar occasions, namely, that of lighting up the flames of civil war. The young king of Prussia laid claim to the province of Silesia, belonging to the house of Austria; and a revolution took place in Russia, by which Elizabeth, the late empress, was placed on the throne, amidst the united acclamations of the people.

In September, his majesty arrived from Hanover; and on the eighteenth of November following, he assembled the parliament. In his speech he took notice, that the Spaniards, sensible that they were not able to oppose the British forces, had called in the assistance of some other powers, as appeared from some very extraordinary steps that had lately been taken; by which he meant the fleet fitted out by the French. He added, that if, contrary to the faith of treaties, and inconsistent with the laws of nations, any power whatever should take part with the Spaniards, the honour of his crown and the safety of the people would require every necessary assistance from the commons. He took notice of the death of the emperor, and how far it was likely to affect the peace of Europe: and concluded with recommending unanimity among the members.

As soon as his majesty had left the house, and the commons were returned to their own house, John, duke of Argyle, moved, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, to congratulate him upon his safe return, and to assure him that the peers would not only stand by him with their lives and fortunes, but that they would exert those inherent privileges enjoyed by them as the highest tribunal in the nation, by promoting the honour, interest, and happiness of his majesty and the kingdom. His grace, in his speech, in order to enforce the motion, arraigned the conduct of the ministry, in not attending to the interest of the nation; and, in express terms, accused them with having given private orders, that none of our ships should attack any of the Spanish forts. He charged them with neglecting to give orders for the fleet to sail; and intimated, it would have still remained at Spithead, had not his majesty returned to England.

The nervous eloquence of the duke attracted the attention of all such peers as were not attached to the ministry, and great debates ensued. The earl of Holderness observed, that the duke's motion was couched under vague, uncertain terms; and therefore moved, that in the address his majesty should be thanked for his gracious care of his people; and that his faithful lords would support him with their lives and fortunes in the execution of every treaty that he had entered into with any of the German princes. This debate was carried on with great strength of argument, and in language that would have done honour to a Roman senate, by lord-chancellor Hardwicke, lord Harvey, lord Cholmondeley, and the earl of Holderness, for the ministry; and against them, by the duke of Argyle, the earl of Chesterfield, lord Carteret, and lord Talbot. At last the question being put, it was carried in favour of the court address; so that the ministry once more triumphed over those who wished well to the nation.

In the house of commons, after a long debate, an address was drawn up in very general terms; and, indeed, too general, when it is considered in what state the nation then was. That the commons might know in what condition the navy was, they moved for an address to be presented to his majesty, desiring that all letters, or other papers sent from admiral Vernon, should be laid before them: and although it was the interest of the minister to have concealed these from the public, yet, by an unaccountable inadvertency, he suffered the motion to pass, and the address was presented. When the letters came to be read, they were found to contain heavy complaints against the ministry, for not sending him proper reinforcements; and that the ships under his command were in so shattered a condition, that they were not fit for action.

A. D. 1741. The country party, though inferior in number, were, in both houses, the most respectable characters, and most justly celebrated for their eloquence, integrity, and disinterestedness. During the month of January this year, the minority in both houses had frequent consultations together, and at last it was resolved to impeach the minister. Mr. Sandys was to manage this business in the lower house; and accordingly, on Friday the thirteenth of February, he stood up in his place, spoke long and sensibly sensibly of the many errors committed by Sir Robert, and traced his conduct as far back as the year 1720. He accused him with having advised his majesty to do some things inconsistent with his dignity; and boldly charged him with concealing from the people the real state of the nation. He took notice, that the people expected no redress of their grievances at home, nor success to their arms abroad, unless the minister was for ever removed from his majesty's councils, as well as all those connected with him. He therefore moved, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, requesting that the right honourable Sir Robert Walpole, knight of the most noble order of the garter, first lord-commissioner of the treasury, and one of his majesty's most honourable privy-council, be removed from his majesty's councils and presence for ever.

Mr. Pitt spoke long and forcibly in favour of the motion; and he was supported by Sir John Barnard, Mr. Pulteney, Sir John Hynde Cotton, lord Limerick, and Mr. Gibson, gentlemen of the greatest abilities and integrity. These celebrated statesmen charged the minister with the most bare-faced acts of corruption, in order to support his own interest; and that he had, in the most unnecessary manner, raised a standing army, which was supported at a vast expence, while the navy, the real strength and security of the nation, had been neglected. They concluded by asserting, that he had imposed on his majesty with respect to the state of Europe in general; and that he had concealed from him the complaints of his people.

Such was the nature of the charge exhibited against the minister, and it must be acknowledged, that it was not ill founded. He had long acted on a system of policy inconsistent with the interest of a free people; and corruption was, by his influence, carried to an enormous height.

Mr. Pelham, brother to the late duke of Newcastle, attempted to vindicate the whole conduct of the minister, and to refute the charges brought against him. He took notice, that all the treaties entered into by advice of the minister, were in consequence of some defects in former ones; and that the state of the nation required that his majesty should form the most powerful connection with the princes on the continent. He added, that the corruption with which the minister was charged, could not be proved; and that the whole of the charge was the effect of envy, because his majesty had distinguished him with particular marks of his confidence and favour. In a word, Mr. Pelham did all he could to vindicate the minister, whose friend he had long been, and who continued firm to his interest, even to the last.

During the debate, which lasted till three o'clock in the morning, the minister said not one word; but when the speakers had gone through with their arguments, he stood up, and spoke in his own defence in the most masterly and eloquent manner. Although conscious that one half of the seats in the house had been given by him to such needy wretches as subsisted by the wages of corruption, yet so little was he afraid that they would expose his character, that he boldly charged the whole house to produce one instance of his having bribed one member, either directly or indirectly. He concluded by saying, that patriotism was a most venerable word, when understood in a proper manner; but it was then so hackneyed, that it had fallen into disgrace. "The form," (said he) is preserved, but the substance is lost. "Patriots spring up like mushrooms; I could make fifty of them within the compass of a night. Let a minister only refuse an unreasonable, or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot: I never was afraid of making patriots, and I despise all that they can do. I believe that no minister ever had such an attack made upon him as the present; but I know it has been long forming; and there are gentlemen here present who know that I could "have prevented it, and by means not difficult to be known. I am convinced of my own integrity; and whatever may be the issue of the present motion, I shall rejoice in it. The whole of my life has been one continued act of duty to my country; and I here defy my most inveterate enemies to prove one single charge which they have, with so much art and appearance of sincerity, exhibited against me."

The minister having finished his harangue, the question was put, and carried in the negative by a small majority, in consequence of above sixty of those who pretended to be of the popular party having gone out.

In the house of lords, the same motion was made by lord Carteret, who was seconded by the dukes of Argyle and Bedford, the earls of Halifax, Carlisle, Berkshire, Abingdon, and Westmoreland, with the lords Bathurst and Haversham. On the other hand, the conduct of the minister was vindicated by the dukes of Devonshire and Newcastle, the lord-chancellor Hardwicke, the earl of Ilay, brother to the duke of Argyle, lord Harvey, the earl of Oxford, and the bishop of Salisbury. The question at last being put, it was carried in the negative. But although the minister was so successful, yet, from that time, his character began to sink; for so many iniquitous practices had been laid open, that although some of them, through the force of prejudice, and the heat of passion, had been considerably exaggerated, yet the sober, thinking members, were convinced that the greater part were too well founded to admit of a single doubt.

The death of the emperor had led his daughter, the queen of Hungary, into a war with the elector of Bavaria, who had married the daughter of the emperor Joseph, and, in consequence of that alliance, laid claim to some of the Austrian dominions. The queen of Hungary demanded from Britain twelve thousand men that had been promised her in consequence of a former treaty; and his majesty, in the beginning of April, went to the house, and informed the parliament of it. He took notice, that he was bound to support his ally; and as the war would be attended with a very great expence, he doubted not but the commons would contribute cheerfully to enable him to support the dignity of his crown, and force his enemies to hearken to the voice of reason. Both houses joined to address the king in the most loyal manner, telling him, that they would enable him to fulfil his engagements with the queen of Hungary, and furnish the necessary supplies for protecting his German dominions from any attacks that might be made upon them by any power whatever. After which, the king having advanced some of the commons to the peerage, he dissolved the parliament, and in May set out to visit Hanover.

The parliamentary business for the season being thus over, it is necessary that we should attend to the state of the navy, and the operations of the fleet. Sir Chaloner Ogle, after meeting with several storms, came to an anchor at the island of St. Dominica, where lord Cathcart died, to the inexpressible grief of the army and navy. The command of the forces devolved upon general Wentworth; and the admiral having taken in fresh water, and other necessary provisions, set sail for Jamaica, in order to join admiral Vernon. In his way thither, he fell in with a part of the French fleet, that had been sent to assist the Spaniards, and a smart engagement ensued; but as war was not then declared between France and England, both admirals thought proper to desist; and on the ninth of January, Sir Chaloner Ogle arrived safe in the harbour of Port-Royal in Jamaica. This revived the drooping spirits of admiral Vernon; for the fleet now amounted to twenty-nine ships, with fifteen thousand seamen, with an equal number of land-forces. Indeed the loss of lord Cathcart was sincerely lamented; but as general Wentworth was considered as an officer of the most undaunted courage, rage, great hopes were formed of the success that would follow.

A council of war was immediately held at Spanish town in Jamaica, wherein it was resolved, that the fleet should sail towards Hispaniola, to observe the motions of the marquis d'Antin, who was supposed to act in concert with the Spaniards; but the marquis had sailed for Europe in a most distressed condition. This disappointment occasioned another council of war to be held, wherein it was resolved to sail to Carthagena, and attack that fort both by sea and land. Accordingly, after a dangerous voyage, the English forces were landed on a small island near the mouth of the harbour, where they erected a battery, and soon made a breach in the principal fort; while the fleet co-operated with them, and general Wentworth resolved to enter the breach that had been made. At first every thing seemed to second their operations, for the Spaniards abandoned the forts, and the English land forces seemed to carry every thing before them. But unfortunately, a misunderstanding having arisen between the admiral and the general, neither would act in a proper manner, while the men, who were obliged to lay during the nights in the fields, exposed to all the inclemencies of the weather, died in great numbers; so that their strength was weakened, and it was feared they would become an easy prey to the enemy.

General Wentworth, in order to recover his lost credit as a military officer, resolved to take the place by storm; but above six hundred of his men were cut off, and all hopes of succeeding vanished. To complete the misfortune, the greatest part of the army lay sick, and it was computed that no less than three thousand four hundred and forty men died in the space of two days, merely in consequence of the misunderstanding that had taken place among the commanders.

A council of war was again called, wherein each officer upbraided the other with not having done their duty; but during their debates the public service was neglected and the enemy left to triumph over our weakness. At last it was resolved to sail for Jamaica, which was effected without any obstacle; but no sooner was the news transmitted to England, than the people were filled with the utmost consternation. All Europe waited with impatience for the event of this expedition, which had cost Britain so much money; and the Spaniards had given up their territories in South America for lost, but this revived their spirits and enabled them to go on with the war with more spirit than ever, and at the same time it encouraged the French to give them assistance.

Whether this unfortunate affair was owing to the conduct of the admiral or the general, is of little importance to the public; but certain it is, that admiral Vernon took such care of the fleet that he was considered as a father rather than a commander.

Having refitted the fleet, which was in a most shattered condition, and taken every proper method for preserving the health of the seamen, he resolved to attack the town of St. Jago in the island of Cuba. He had great hopes of succeeding in this enterprize, and accordingly the forces were landed; but general Wentworth still opposed the admiral, so that nothing of consequence was done, nor any honour acquired to the nation. The public money was squandered away in an empty parade; the people were filled with hopes, and in the end, being disappointed, discontent took place every where. It is true, some few of the enemy's ships had been destroyed, but that was not attended with any success worth mentioning; and after a fruitless attempt to bring honour to the British crown and reputation to her arms, it was resolved to sail to Jamaica, where the fleet arrived, though not before many of the men had lost their lives by such disorders as are peculiar to the climate in that part of the world.

The disgrace that attended the British navy in the West Indies had a considerable effect on the political state of Europe, according to the views of the different courts. The young king of Prussia, whose political and military talents had been hitherto concealed, demanded of the queen of Hungary the province of Silesia, in consequence of some old claims which had been given up by his ancestors; but in all disputes between princes, power becomes predominant. The Prussian army was then the best disciplined in Europe, the king, at their head entering Silesia, every thing gave way to him, while the queen of Hungary, who had taken possession of her hereditary dominions, relied for support on Great Britain. Indeed the Prussian monarch bought his conquests extremely dear; for count Neuperg, having raised an army, a most bloody battle ensued at Molwitz, near the river Neiss. For some time it was doubtful in whose favour victory would declare herself, till at last, about six in the evening, the king of Prussia, by one of those masterly strokes for which his character has been so justly celebrated, obliged the Austrians to retire, and the town of Neiss surrendered to the conqueror.

This blow, though not decisive, threatened the Austrian dominions with immediate ruin; but the queen of Hungary had still great hopes from the late resolutions of the British parliament. She also solicited the assistance of the states-general; but the king of Prussia sent a threatening letter to the Hague, wherein he informed the states, that if they took any part in the present war, so as to oppose him, he would seize on such parts of their territories as his ancestors had formerly laid claim to. To enforce his orders, he commanded a body of six thousand men to encamp on the frontiers of Holland, which so intimidated the Dutch, that they were obliged to apply to the earl of Hyndford, the English ambassador, to intercede in their favour. But all these means proved ineffectual; for the Prussian monarch, finding that the court of Vienna, in concert with some other European powers, had entered into a confederacy against him, he resolved to keep possession of the places he had taken in Silesia; and that he might be able to add the whole of that valuable province to his territories, he concluded a treaty offensive and defensive with France.

In the mean time the French, ever restless and ambitious, resolved to humble the power of the house of Austria; and for that purpose made choice of the elector of Bavaria, who was intended to be made emperor, and the hereditary dominions of the queen of Hungary were to be settled on him and his family. Cardinal Fleury, who at that time was the chief minister at the court of Versailles, was in the eighty-fifth year of his age, and a man of a most pacific disposition; but notwithstanding all his abilities, yet no sooner had the French learned that the king of Prussia had declared in favour of the elector of Bavaria, than the whole people called out for war, and the cardinal was obliged to give way to the public clamour. The French king was so averse to every measure that seemed to countenance the claims of the house of Austria, that he resolved to place the elector of Bavaria on the imperial throne, and secure to himself such of the Austrian provinces in the Netherlands as lay nearest to his own dominions. This was a deep laid scheme, and the news of it was sent to the marshal de Bellisle, then in Germany, that he might be ready for carrying on the intended project.

The bad success attending the English arms in America, gave life to every opposition made against them by any of the European powers. The marshal de Bellisle had his army strongly reinforced; and the Spaniards, eager to strengthen themselves by any alliance whatever, sent considerable sums of money to Paris to defray the expences of the war in Germany.

In order to give some colour to these hostile preparations, the French king published a manifesto, wherein he asserted, that nothing but the safety of his people could have induced him to take such a step; but as the king of England had assembled an army in Germany, so he thought it his duty to do the same. In the mean time, the marshal de Belleisle, who acted both as general and ambassador, conducted matters with so much art, that the king of Prussia, with the elector of Saxony, were both brought into a general confederacy against the house of Austria, whose dominions were to be parcelled out among them. This was a treaty of so unjust and infamous a nature, that no excuse can be made for it, because it entails infamy upon every one of the parties.

The elector of Bavaria, thus powerfully strengthened, took the field, and declared war against the queen of Hungary, whose whole forces, except a few in garrisons, were engaged in opposing those of the king of Prussia. At first, the elector of Bavaria spread consternation wherever he came, even to the gates of Vienna; while a large body of French troops, under the command of the marshal Maillebois, penetrated through Westphalia to the frontiers of Hanover. His Britannic majesty was then in Hanover; and his whole German forces, amounting to no more than twenty-six thousand men; and the king of Prussia being ready with an army to support the French, he found himself under the necessity of signing a treaty; by which it was stipulated, that the Hanoverian forces should not take any part in the war, but observe a strict neutrality. The queen of Hungary was now driven from Germany, and most of her dominions seized by the enemy. Denied assistance from any prince in the empire, except the elector of Hanover, and he, at the moment his army intended to march to her assistance, was obliged to sign a treaty of neutrality. In that distressed situation, the queen had recourse to methods more proper, and more advantageous than the assistance of any foreign power whatever. She assembled the states of Hungary, a brave, warlike people, who had been subject to her ancestors above six hundred years; and coming into the state-house at Presburg, she held her son, then about six months old, and at present emperor of Germany, in her arms, and addressed her subjects, in Latin, to the following import.

She told them, that her most unhappy circumstances, as they then were, left her no reason to hope that she could ever extricate herself out of such difficulties, unless she was assisted in the most powerful manner. She added, that she was abandoned by her friends, persecuted by her enemies, and that even her own relations had conspired against her. "I have none to trust to but you, my dear and loyal subjects. Here is your king in my arms; to you I commit both him and myself, not doubting but you will support me in opposing my enemies: and if I should be so unfortunate as to lose all in Germany, I shall once more throw myself into the arms of my Hungarian subjects." This speech, delivered in the most tender and pathetic manner, had the desired effect. Many ladies in the hall shed tears; but the brave deputies drawing their swords, called out, "Moriatur pro rege Maria-Theresa!" "We will die for our king Maria-Theresa;" for the Hungarians always speak of their sovereigns in the masculine gender.

It is impossible to express the zeal that her loyal subjects exerted on the present occasion: there seemed to be a contest among them who should be the first to assist their distressed sovereign; and in the compass of a few weeks, an army of thirty thousand men, under the command of count Palfy, an old experienced general, was sent to the relief of Vienna. Prince Charles of Lorraine, the favourite of the Austrian army, had raised some forces, in concert with his brother the grand duke of Tuscany; and several other small armies continued to protect some of the most important towns in Bohemia; and a variety of circumstances seemed to concur towards extricating the queen of Hungary out of her numerous difficulties, and turning the intended mischief upon her enemies.

Cardinal de Fleury, ever attentive to the interests of his country, and well acquainted with the internal power of Great-Britain, left nothing undone to persuade the French king to adopt the most pacific measures; and finding his opinion over-ruled, he was so dilatory in sending provisions and ammunition to the army in Germany, that the marshal de Belleisle found himself reduced to great hardships. Nor was the elector of Bavaria in much better circumstances. Instead of attacking Vienna, which would undoubtedly have surrendered, he spent his time in the most dilatory manner; while Khevenhuller, the bravest of the Austrian generals, did not fail to take every advantage, in order to recover such places as had been taken from his royal mistress. But the elector of Saxony, who owed the crown of Poland to the late emperor, joined his whole army to that of the French and Bavarians; and marching to Prague, the capital of Bohemia, it was invested with such fury, that the whole garrison surrendered prisoners of war; while the grand duke, who was marching to its relief, found himself under the necessity of retiring more to the southward.

Prince Charles of Lorraine, who commanded under his brother the grand duke, proposed that the army should be divided into three bodies, viz. one under the grand duke, a second under prince Lobkowitz, and a third under Khevenhuller. Several advantages were obtained by these different armies, but the most important was that by Khevenhuller, who defeated the general Segur, who commanded for the elector of Bavaria; and afterwards being joined by the army under the grand duke, he attacked the city of Lintz, the capital of the Upper Austria, and the garrison was obliged to capitulate.

The court of France, eager to pursue the measures already taken, proceeded with such celerity, that the elector of Bavaria was crowned emperor, little opposition being made to his title. But this step was trifling to what the French had in view: for as they had resolved not to leave the queen of Hungary in possession of one single province, an ambassador was sent to the Grand Signior, to inform him that he had now an opportunity of humbling the house of Austria, and annexing to his European dominions the ancient kingdom of Hungary.

This was a measure the queen of Hungary had not foreseen; and therefore, as soon as the news of it was communicated to her, she was filled with the utmost consternation. However, her natural fortitude, and a presence of mind for which she had been always distinguished, supported her drooping spirits; and she wrote a letter, with her own hand, to the Grand Signior, wherein she mentioned the distressed situation to which she was reduced; and begging that, consistent with the character of an heroic prince, he would not avail himself of circumstances that could not, in the end, produce any real advantage.

The pope gave the queen leave to claim one tenth of the revenues of all ecclesiastical benefices within her dominions: and the empress of Russia intended to have assisted her, but the French stirred up the Swedes to declare war against that princess. The Swedes accordingly entered the province of Livonia, and took some of the most important places; but the Russians at last drove them from their territories. This was succeeded by a revolution in Peterburgh, by which the empress was deposed, and Elizabeth, the daughter of Peter the Great, elected empress in her room.

This revolution, however sudden and unexpected, did not disconcert any measures taken by the queen of Hungary, in order to secure her honour and interest. General Berner, who commanded for her in Austria, made an irruption into Bavaria, where he destroyed several of the French magazines, and obliged the garrisons of Tichel and Hallstadt to submit, as prisoners of war. This masterly stroke opened a passage for the Austrian army into the center of Bavaria; and, upon the whole, the campaign was finished much to the advantage of the queen of Hungary. The French had tried every method to bring over the king of Sardinia to their interest, but in vain; for that prince was extremely jealous of the Spaniards or French getting footing in Italy. Genoa, indeed, declared against the queen of Hungary; and the kingdom of Naples being, in a manner, dependent on Spain, and Spain directed by French councils, it was no difficult matter to persuade the court of Madrid to send a body of forces into Italy; and before admiral Haddock could come up with them, they were joined by the French fleet in the harbour of Toulon.

In the latter end of October, his majesty returned to England; and on the first of December, the new parliament met at Westminster. During the election for new members, the minority acquired considerable advantages, in consequence of the neglect of the minister, who still considered himself as sure of a majority that would support his measures, and screen him from censure. This had induced him to neglect his common practices of corrupting electors; so that his ruin seemed not far distant.

His majesty, in his speech, told the members, that he had entered into the present war with Spain by their advice and concurrence; and that, with respect to the confederacy that had been formed against the queen of Hungary, it was too well known to the nation in general, for him to descend to particulars: that, consistent with the advice of his parliament, he had done every thing in his power to support that unfortunate princess, by striving to dissolve such connections as had been formed against her; but as he had hitherto been unsuccessful, he doubted not but his parliament would enable him to pursue such measures as would bring the war to a happy conclusion.

The commons being returned to their own house, Mr. Herbert, afterwards earl of Powis, moved for an address to his majesty, which was seconded by some other members: but lord Noel Somerset having proposed, that it should be inserted in the address, that Britain should not be involved in a war, in order to preserve his majesty's dominions in Germany, a long debate ensued, in which it appeared evident that the minister had lost much of that superiority which he had hitherto maintained over the house. At last a formal, though very bold address, was agreed to; but no sooner was it presented, than the minister was blamed for not exerting himself with more spirit, which, in reality, he might have done; but he seemed to be altogether infatuated.

For some years, there had been a misunderstanding between the king and the prince of Wales, who, on many accounts, was beloved by the people: and the minister laying hold of this circumstance, resolved to make up the breach, and so reconcile himself to both. Dr. Secker, then bishop of Oxford, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, was employed, on this occasion, as a mediator. But the prince desired him to inform his majesty, that 'however willing and desirous he was to regain his long lost favour, he would not countenance any measure of government till the minister was removed.'

A. D. 1742. This was the last blow given to the power of the minister; for, on the third of February, his majesty adjourned both houses of parliament to the eighteenth; and, in the mean time, Sir Robert Walpole was created earl of Orford, and resigned all his employments. The prince of Wales was, soon after, reconciled to his royal father, and a guard appointed to attend him at Carlton-house; while some of the principal persons in the opposition were advanced to the highest employments: but still the influence of Sir Robert seemed to operate on the ministry; and his removal from his places was looked upon in no other light than as a sham contrivance to amuse the nation.

On the eighteenth of February, the parliament met, according to the time mentioned in their last adjournment; and petitions were presented to them from the merchants of the most eminent trading towns in the nation, complaining that their goods had been taken by the enemy, because the ministry had neglected to send out force sufficient to protect them. This induced the house to resolve itself into a committee, to consider of the nature of these grievances; and the people in general began to hope for redress, when they found that the minister, who had so long been the object of their resentment, was removed from the council. But these hopes soon vanished; for many of those who had so violently opposed the ministry, no sooner found themselves invested with power, than they resolved to gratify their avarice and ambition, by acting on the same principles with him. Disputes arose among them, which were agitated with great heat on both sides, while the interest of the nation was, in a manner, totally neglected. Some were for calling the late minister to an account for his conduct; but others opposed it, because the profits that he had formerly enjoyed were now divided among themselves. The nation in general cried out against him, and were supported in the house by such discontented members as had not been advanced to places in consequence of the late change; but he was powerfully supported by many of those who had formerly been his most inveterate enemies.

Motions were made in the house of commons to repeal the act for septennial parliaments, and likewise the pension-bill; but both these passed in the negative, although supported by a powerful party. This began to open the eyes of the people; for as these two points were the principal objects the patriots pretended to have in view, and as their number had been considerably increased at the last general election, it was not doubted but they would have carried both the motions: but they were mistaken; for those who had appeared most forward while Sir Robert was at the head of affairs, now did all in their power to oppose every measure that tended towards promoting the interest and security of the nation. In a word, the people lost all confidence in their representatives; they had changed men, but the same measures were pursued. Those who had been the strongest in the opposition, were brought over by pensions, or allured by titles; among whom was the famous Mr. Pulteney, who had so long distinguished himself in the house of commons. He was created earl of Bath, and gratified with a large part of the crown lands; but from that moment his popularity sunk into contempt.

It is now time that we should return to the continent, and consider the operations of war, which the British nation had so liberally contributed towards supporting. The earl of Stair, a man equally acquainted with war and politics, had been appointed commander in chief of the army, in the room of John duke of Argyle, who had resigned all his employments; and early in the spring that nobleman went over to the Hague, to try if he could bring the united provinces to declare in favour of the queen of Hungary. But although he was a man of the greatest address, and well acquainted with the passions of statesmen, yet he found it impossible to bring over the Dutch to our measures. Accordingly he was recalled, and lord Carteret sent in his room. The troops that had been raised in England for the service of the queen of Hungary, embarked for Flanders the latter end of April, under the command of the earl of Stair. They were to be joined by twenty-five thousand Hanoverians, and six thousand Hessians, who had been taken into the pay of Great-Britain. But things took a different turn from what was expected, as will appear in the course of this work.

The king of Sardinia was convinced that he must stand or fall with the house of Austria; and therefore, as soon as he heard of the alteration that had taken taken place in the British ministry, he resolved to join his forces to those of the queen of Hungary. The French were terribly alarmed at this resolution of his Sardinian majesty; and as they doubted not but their harbours would be visited by the British fleets, they resolved to put their navy on a proper footing. The Austrian arms, still attended with more success than could have been expected, penetrated into the center of Bavaria, and Munich, the capital city of that electorate, surrendered to them. The queen of Hungary, no stranger with respect to the most proper methods to be used in order to acquire the esteem and secure the affections of her army, wrote a letter to general Khevenhüller, desiring him to thank the soldiers in her name, and to present them with the pictures of herself and her son Joseph. No sooner were the pictures shewn to the army, than they seemed fired with enthusiasm in favour of their sovereign; and their whole conduct, during the remainder of the war, was a convincing proof of their loyalty.

The critical state of affairs in Bavaria induced the French to send a fresh reinforcement thither, in order to drive the Austrians from Munich; upon which the garrison, being afraid that they would be taken prisoners, abandoned the place: but before the French could march thither, it was retaken by a large body of Austrians. General Khevenhüller finding that another body of French, under the command of duke Harcourt, were marching to oppose him, quitted the city of Munich; and, in order to secure a retreat, threw a bridge across the Danube. Both armies came to an engagement near the banks of the Danube, where the Bavarians were defeated with considerable loss: but prince Maurice of Saxony, afterwards known by the name of Marshal Saxe, took the town of Egra; while Glatz, and some other towns in Silesia, being greatly reduced for want of provisions, and having lost many of their men, were obliged to surrender to the king of Prussia, who seemed to carry every thing before him.

The army under the command of prince Charles of Lorraine amounted to upwards of forty thousand men, besides a large body of irregulars drawn from the most remote parts of the provinces. The Austrians had the greatest confidence in prince Charles; and, in general, he was very successful, for he prevented the king of Prussia from marching into Bohemia, at least for some time. This gave fresh spirits to the Austrians; and prince Charles finding himself under an absolute necessity of coming to a battle with the king of Prussia, both armies met at a place called Czaflaw, about thirty miles east from Prague. A most bloody engagement ensued; for both armies were nearly equal in number, and both were composed of as brave soldiers as ever took the field. The king of Prussia, after his men had done every thing in their power, was going to give way; but the irregulars that followed the Austrian army broke into the Prussian camp for plunder, and their example being followed by the regulars, the king embraced that opportunity to rally, and prince Charles was defeated, with the loss of three thousand men.

This victory might have enabled the king of Prussia to penetrate into the heart of Bohemia; but he began to discover that he could not put any confidence in the French, who had hitherto deceived him with promises of new reinforcements. This induced him to think of making peace with the queen of Hungary, and no time seemed so proper as when the memory of the late battle was recent in the minds of the Austrians. A packet, with dispatches, had been sent to the marshal de Broglie, the French general, which was, by mistake, delivered to his Prussian majesty; and, upon perusing the contents, he discovered that it was the intention of the French court to spare their army as much as possible, by throwing the burthen of the war upon him. In a letter to marshal de Broglie, and in a conference with marshal de Belleisle, he upbraided them for not seconding him in his operations; but they still continued to deceive him with false hopes. Accordingly a treaty was concluded between the king of Prussia and the queen of Hungary, by which the latter gave up Silesia, with the province of Glatz in Bohemia, upon condition of his withdrawing his forces, and observing a strict neutrality. The elector of Saxony made peace with the queen of Hungary at the same time; so that the French were deprived of two of their allies, and the emperor was left exposed to the whole power of the Austrian army.

Prince Charles, immediately after the battle of Czaflaw, marched towards Budweis, where he was joined by prince Lobkowitz, and their united army amounted to sixty thousand men. Thus reinforced, prince Charles crossed the Moldaw, and attacked a body of French under the command of M. de Aubigné, and put them to flight. He pursued and harassed them so much, that their loss was equal to a defeat in a general engagement. The hussars pillaged the French of their baggage; and such of the soldiers as happened to stray from the main body, were murdered by the peasants. In the mean time, the marshal de Broglie came up with a body of forces to oppose prince Charles, who was on the point of cutting off the whole French army; but nothing could re-animate the drooping spirits of his army; and they were so much struck with terror, that they never looked behind them till they came under the walls of Prague. Here they were joined by the army under the command of marshal de Belleisle, and both generals resolved to concert the most proper methods for opposing prince Charles. As soon as prince Charles came within sight of the French at Prague, he encamped his men, and next day he was joined by his brother, the grand duke.

The marshal de Belleisle was now so much distracted concerning what means he could use to preserve his army, that he offered to give up Prague upon condition that his men were allowed to depart, unmolested, out of Bohemia; but all the answer they received was, they must surrender prisoners of war. This would have been a fatal stroke to France; and had it taken place, their whole scheme would have been defeated; so that there remained nothing to be done but to defend the place to the last extremity; and, in consequence thereof, one of the most remarkable sieges took place that we meet with in history.

On the twenty-eighth of July, the trenches were opened; and although the Austrian army was more formidable in appearance than that of the French, yet the latter were better acquainted with the arts of attack and defence, and their generals behaved with the most intrepid spirit and undaunted resolution. They knew that the strongest enemy they had to contend with was famine, for they doubted not but the Austrians would hinder the peasants from sending in provisions. This happened just as they expected; for in a short time, meat was sold for three shillings and sixpence a pound, and horse flesh was eaten by many of the gentry. Forage was so scarce, that fourteen thousand horses were either killed or turned loose, while the French officers gave every thing they had to purchase provisions for the soldiers.

On the twenty-second of August, the marshal de Belleisle made a sally, at the head of twelve thousand men, drove the Austrians from their works, filled up some of the entrenchments, and took general Monty prisoner, besides killing fifteen hundred men.

Nor was the bravery of the Austrians less conspicuous; for prince Charles and the grand duke exposed their persons on every occasion, in order to animate the soldiers. Cardinal Fleury, who had the utmost aversion to war, proposed bringing about an accommodation, and desired the king of Great-Britain to become a mediator; but his late majesty knew that no confidence could be placed in any proposal made by the cardinal, and therefore rejected his overtures with disdain. Finding himself baffled in this undertaking, he wrote a letter to the Austrian generals, wherein wherein he informed them, that he had opposed the war, but was over-ruled by the king and marshal de Belleisle: and this letter, which made a considerable noise, was published at Vienna.

It is not consistent with the plan of this work to descend to every particular that happened during this memorable siege. There were in the city, besides the French army, at least one hundred thousand inhabitants, whose distress was beyond description, nor was there a possibility of relieving them. The marquis de Fenelon, then ambassador at the Hague, proposed that the army under the command of the marshal Maillebois should be sent to relieve Prague; for France had been, in a manner, exhausted both of men and money. This proposal was strongly opposed by the cardinal, who insisted, that if the brave army under the command of marshal Maillebois should be sent into Bohemia, then France would be left exposed both to England and Holland; but the marquis de Fenelon having undertaken to keep the states-general from engaging in the war, the measure was adopted, although apparently attended with very dangerous consequences. The emperor was averse to this plan, because his hereditary dominions were over-run by the Austrians; and he insisted, that if they were driven out of Bavaria, Prague would be relieved of course. Nor was Maillebois less averse to this measure than the emperor; but the orders sent to him being absolute, he began his march from the Lower Rhine about the middle of August, at the head of a brave, well-disciplined army. The duke de Harcourt was then in Bavaria, the imperialists were under the command of general Seckendorff, and the brave Khevenhuller watched their motions with an army of Austrians. But the principal object that engaged the attention of Europe was the fate of Prague.

Prince Charles of Lorraine, ever attentive to his duty as a brave officer, no sooner heard that the marshal Maillebois was marching against him, than he turned the siege of Prague into a blockade; and, committing the care of it to prince Lobkowitz, set out to meet the French, in order to prevent their marching into Bohemia. In his march he was joined by the troops under Khevenhuller, but not before the imperialists had, by forced marches, given them the slip; and, in their way towards the French camp, marshal Saxe, become a great favourite with the army, joined them, so that Maillebois found himself strongly supported. This junction of the three armies was entirely owing to the good conduct of count Saxe; and from that time his knowledge in military affairs shone with such a distinguishing lustre, that no plan of operations was laid down without first consulting him.

The French marshals, Belleisle and Broglie, resolving to avail themselves of the departure of prince Charles, made several sallies upon the Austrians, who were at last obliged to raise the siege; so that all the detached parties of each army found an opportunity of joining together in two very formidable bodies. Prince Charles finding himself reduced to the alternative of either venturing on a battle, the fate of which would decide the war, or leaving the kingdom of Bohemia exposed to the French, resolved to avail himself of the most trifling circumstance.

The scarcity of provisions had obliged the French army once more to divide itself into separate bodies; and prince Charles, who was well acquainted with the country, resolved, if possible, to prevent their joining a second time. This had the desired effect; for the French being reduced to the greatest extremity for want of provisions, the main body under Maillebois marched towards Bavaria, where that general was disgraced, and the command given to marshal Broglie, who had disguised himself as a peasant, to escape the Austrians, and in that manner had travelled several days without being suspected.

Belleisle, who had been obliged to return to Prague, was so closely blocked up by the Austrians, that he resolved, if possible, to make his escape from a place that he was not able to defend. This scheme he put in practice in such a masterly manner, as must convince every one that he was one of the most accomplished generals of that age. He sent out some spies, who pretended to be deserters, and they being taken to the Austrian general Lobkowitz, they informed him that the marshal, during the next night, intended to make a general sally from a particular quarter of the town. The Austrians, not doubting the truth of this story, drew off their forces to that quarter; and, in the mean time, marshal de Belleisle made his escape from the place, and got at least a day's march from Prague before prince Lobkowitz knew any thing of his departure. Three thousand of the French were left in Prague, and Belleisle continued marching ten days, over ice and snow, before the Austrians could come up with him. At last prince Lobkowitz getting intelligence what route they had taken, came in sight of them; but not chusing to venture on a general engagement with men reduced to a state of desperation, he resolved to block up such passes as lay before them, and so prevent them from joining with the main body of forces in Bavaria.

But notwithstanding the vigilance of the Austrian general, yet the marshal de Belleisle rose superior to every difficulty. He made choice of a road so dangerous and unfrequented, that the enemy had no notion of his ever going that way; and although he was so much afflicted with the rheumatism, that he was obliged to be carried in a sedan, yet he gave orders in the most cool and deliberate manner, without ever complaining of the hardships he suffered. At last, after a march, over snow and ice, of above one hundred and fifty miles, and surmounting incredible difficulties, he arrived safe at Egra, having lost about a thousand men through the inclemency of the weather, but none by any other accidents whatever. The troops left by him in Prague capitulated on the same day that he had completed his march, and were allowed to march to Egra; so that this distressed city was relieved, after a siege of five months and some days.

Such was the state of affairs in Germany during the year 1742. But we must now look to Italy, where the different contending powers were using their utmost endeavours to light up the flames of war, and bring the smaller principalities, as well as the most powerful states, into an alliance with them. The queen of Hungary, sensible that the king of Sardinia, consistent with his own interest, could not join with France or Spain, resolved to bring him over to her measures, and accordingly dispatched an ambassador, for that purpose, to the court of Turin. But the Sardinian monarch was too cunning to enter into any negotiation till he had made proposals to the court of London, in order to procure such a subsidy as would defray his expences. Indeed the English ministry were now convinced that they ought not to keep any measures of a pacific nature with France: the views of that court were now fully laid open, especially when it is considered in what manner they assisted the Spanish fleet when it was opposed in the Mediterranean by admiral Haddock, whose orders were of so ambiguous a nature, that he knew not in what manner to act.

Admiral Haddock was now so much reduced by sickness, that he found himself under an absolute necessity of returning to England for the re-establishment of his health; and the command of the fleet devolved upon commodore Leacock, who had lately arrived from the West-Indies.

As soon as the admiral had set sail for England, the commodore made a proper inquiry into the state of the fleet; and finding that the whole number of ships amounted to twenty-eight, he weighed anchor, and arrived safe in the harbour of Port-Mahon, in the island of Minorca. There he took in fresh provisions; and having refitted such of the ships as were damaged, he sailed from Mahon, and appeared before the harbour of Toulon. The French, who imagined that he had come there in a hostile manner, were filled with consternation, but nothing of importance was done; and, in consequence of the change that had taken place in the English ministry, admiral Matthews was sent to the Mediterranean, to take upon him the command of the fleet; and Leftock, who had, on former occasions, distinguished himself, was raised to the degree of an admiral.

This step, in joining these two admirals together, was considered as the most impolitic measure that could have been pursued; for there had formerly been many differences between them; and it was not doubted but they would do all in their power to cross each other. In the mean time, admiral Matthews took care to put the fleet on the most respectable footing; and accordingly, soon after his arrival, he burnt some Spanish ships that had taken shelter in the bay of St. Tropez, on the coast of the Mediterranean. He also sent commodore Martin to Naples, to demand that the king of the two Sicilies would immediately withdraw his troops from the Spanish army in Italy; and to sign an agreement, that he would not give them any assistance whatever. The whole city of Naples was filled with the utmost consternation at the peremptory manner in which the English admiral made his demands; but necessity obliged pride to give way, and the king of Sicily, consistent with the duty he owed to his people, was obliged to withdraw his troops, by which the Spanish army was considerably weakened.

The Spaniards had attempted to send a large body of men into Italy; but although they were powerfully assisted by the French, yet such was the spirited conduct of the king of Sardinia, that he drove them back from Piedmont with very considerable loss. The Austrians in Italy taking fresh courage from this circumstance, returned to the duchy of Modena, and laid all the towns under contribution. Thus every thing on the part of the queen of Hungary seemed to wear a most promising aspect in Italy. The king of Sardinia was her ally; the king of Naples was prevented from doing her any injury: some of the smaller states were overawed; while admiral Matthews was cruising in the Mediterranean, to prevent either the French or Spaniards from landing any forces.

While these things were transacting on the continent of Europe, the British affairs in America were in the most deplorable situation. The admiral and the commander of the land forces could never agree in any single proposal; and the time that should have been devoted towards prosecuting the war, was spent in idle contention, the effect of passion and malevolence.

A reinforcement had been sent over to admiral Vernon in the West-Indies; and it was proposed to sail to Porto-Bello, and from thence to send a detachment, over the isthmus of Darien, to Panama, the capital city of that province. Admiral Vernon was of opinion, that no time should be lost; and therefore, having anchored in the harbour of Porto-Bello, he dispatched Mr. Lowther, an officer of the army, to bring him proper intelligence concerning the situation of Panama, and what force would be necessary to reduce it. Upon the return of Mr. Lowther, a council of war was held, wherein he gave it as his opinion, that they could not, with safety, attack the fort of Panama, on account of the rainy season, and the great sickness that prevailed in the army. In this he was seconded by the other officers of the land forces; and admiral Vernon, vexed to the utmost, found himself under the necessity of returning once more to Jamaica, to take in fresh provisions, without having been able to do any thing for the service of his country. So true is it, that nothing so much retards the progress of an army as differences among the commanders.

On the sixteenth of November, the British parliament met at Westminster; when the king informed them, that he had taken into his pay sixteen thousand Hanoverian and Hessian forces, in order to strengthen the army on the continent. He took notice of the state of Europe, particularly Germany; and spoke in the highest terms concerning the magnanimous conduct of the queen of Hungary. He added, that an alliance with the queen of Hungary in the war would humble the power of France and Spain, and make Britain more respectable than ever. He observed, that although the expence of the war would be great, yet it was necessary; and therefore the proper estimates should be laid before the commons, not doubting but they would contribute towards supporting him in the same cheerful manner as they had hitherto done. This was what he hoped no person could have any reasonable objection to; and he assured them, that the strictest œconomy should be observed by himself.

His majesty having left the house, and the commons were returned, great debates arose concerning the words of the address that should be presented. This opposition was occasioned by the conduct of the discontented members, who not being gratified according to their expectations, became as inveterate enemies to that ministry they had set up, as they had been to that which they pulled down. But all these attempts proved unsuccessful; for both houses presented most dutiful and loyal addresses to his majesty, wherein they approved entirely of every part of his conduct, and thanked him for his great care in watching so attentively over the affairs of Europe. They assured him, that nothing should be wanting to support the dignity of his majesty's crown, and humble his enemies in every part of the world.

The committee of ways and means took into consideration in what manner the proper supplies were to be raised; for on the last day of this year, (1742) the national debt amounted to forty-eight millions, nine hundred and fifteen thousand forty-seven pounds, sixteen shillings and nine-pence halfpenny.

A. D. 1743. The land-tax was raised to four shillings in the pound; seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds were borrowed on excise-bills; eight hundred thousand pounds were to be raised by a lottery; one million was taken from the sinking fund, besides the whole surplus of the exchequer. The whole sum granted by parliament to defray the expences of this year, amounted to five millions, three hundred and fourteen thousand one hundred pounds.

Motions were made to revive the place and pension bills, and to enquire into the conduct of the earl of Orford during the last ten years of his administration. But although these motions were strongly supported by Sir Watkyn-Williams Wynn and Mr. Lyttleton, yet they were thrown out by a great majority. Another motion was made, that his majesty be enabled to take into British pay such a body of Hanoverian and Hessian dragoons as should be consistent with the state of affairs on the continent. This was most violently opposed by the country-party; and it was urged, that by the act of settlement, Great-Britain was not to be concerned in any war relating to his majesty's electoral dominions: nay, some of the members insisted, that to demand money to support the Hanoverian forces, was a gross imposition on the English nation; for they knew that those troops could not take part with the queen of Hungary, without bringing his majesty under the ban of the empire. It was answered by the minority, that every thing done by his majesty was in compliance with the advice of his parliament; but this was denied by those in the opposition, who insisted, that what was promised was upon a supposition that the states-general would have joined their forces with those of Great-Britain, in order to oppose the French, and support the queen of Hungary in the peaceable possession of her hereditary territories.

Much was said by those at the head of affairs concerning the balance of power in Europe, which could not be maintained consistent with the safety of Britain, unless unless we assisted the house of Austria. At last the question being put, it was carried in favour of the ministry by a great majority. In the house of lords, it met with still greater opposition; for earl Stanhope moved, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying, that he would take into his royal consideration the distress of the nation, in consequence of the enormous load of taxes; and that he would be pleased to discharge all such foreign troops as had been taken into British pay without the consent of parliament. This motion was seconded by the earl of Sandwich, and supported by the duke of Bedford, the earl of Chesterfield, viscount Lonsdale, and lord Harvey. The principal speakers in defence of the ministry were, the lord-chancellor Hardwick, the duke of Newcastle, the earls of Cholmondeley and Bath, lord Bathurst and lord Carteret; for sentiments changed with the admission into places.

The next business upon which the parliament entered, was to take into consideration the state of the licences for the sale of wines and spirituous liquors, and to impose other duties upon them than what had been done hitherto. It appeared evident, that the late restriction upon the sale of spirituous liquors had not been of any service in promoting the health or morals of the people; and therefore, that the sale of those pernicious articles might become more common, it was proposed to lower the taxes. The whole bench of bishops voted against this measure; and the archbishop of Canterbury, in particular, spoke long and learnedly on the subject. Lord Harvey, who had been deprived of the privy-seal, vented all his spleen against the ministry, by comparing their conduct, in lowering the duties on spirituous liquors, to a tyrant who lets loose a wild beast upon a parcel of innocent children. Many eloquent harangues were delivered in the house of lords on this memorable occasion, particularly by the duke of Bedford, the earls of Chesterfield, Sandwich, and Aylesford, and the lords Talbot and Lonsdale.

On the other hand, the bill was supported by the duke of Newcastle, the earls of Bath, Cholmondeley, and Ilay, with the lords Bathurst and Carteret. During this argument, many brilliant sallies of wit were thrown out on both sides, particularly by the earl of Ilay, who levelled his satire at the bishops; and by the earl of Chesterfield, who ripped up all the sores of the ministry. At last, the question being put, it was, as usual, carried in favour of the ministry, by a very great majority.

The minority in both houses finding the power of the ministry too strong for them to overthrow, resolved to give them all the trouble they could, by plying them in parliament with one motion after another. Accordingly they moved, that an address be presented to his majesty, praying that he would order the proper officer to lay before the house copies of all papers and memorials, with the answers to them, that had passed between the courts of Vienna and London: but this motion, with several others, was carried in favour of the ministry, while those in the opposition were provoked to the highest degree.

On the twenty-third of April, his majesty went to the house; and having given his assent to the bills, delivered a speech, wherein he told them, that he had ordered his army, in conjunction with that of the queen of Hungary, to cross the Rhine, and watch the motions of the French: that he had given orders to continue a strong fleet in the Mediterranean, to prevent the Spaniards from sending forces to Italy; and another in the West-Indies: that he would not neglect any proper measures that could tend towards restoring the tranquillity of Europe, and procuring such an honourable peace as would promote the interest both of his people and his allies. Lastly, he thanked the commons for the cheerful manner in which they had granted the supplies; told them, that the money should be expended according to their direction; and doubted not but they would be ready to support him on any future occasion; and then the lord-chancellor prorogued both houses.

During the beginning of this year, nothing was to be seen throughout the greatest part of Europe, but preparations for opening the campaign. In Germany, the emperor Charles VII. was at the head of one party, strongly supported by the French; and, in opposition to him, was the queen of Hungary, assisted by Great-Britain. The English ministry endeavoured to prevail with the states-general to join in supporting the house of Austria; and these endeavours being seconded by the prince of Orange, who was extremely fond of war, the Dutch raised, or rather increased, their army to forty thousand foot and five thousand horse, to be ready to march when ordered. This spirited resolution in the states, who had so long remained neuter, surprised all Europe; but, upon enquiry, it was found, that they had been instigated by Mr. Van Haren, a young gentleman, and one of the deputies. He wrote elegant allegorical pieces, wherein he compared Holland to ancient Greece, when that famous republic was oppressed by the Persians and Macedonians; and these pieces being universally read, the people were roused from a state of insensibility.

The king of Prussia was cultivating the arts of peace in his dominions. The new empress of Russia refused to join the French; and the king of Sweden was too far advanced in years to engage in any enterprizes of a public nature. Such was the state of Europe, when cardinal Fleury paid the debt of nature, in the ninetieth year of his age. He was a man of great political abilities, and seemed to possess the untainted simplicity of the primitive ages. He had lived in an obscure manner till he was upwards of sixty years old, and then he was appointed bishop of Frejus, a small living, and situated in a very unhealthy part of the kingdom. At last superior merit brought him into office, and the pope honoured him with a cardinal's hat. As a minister, the principal object he had in view was to promote the internal happiness of the French people, to preserve peace in Europe, and to make his sovereign great without oppressing his subjects. In him the French king lost an able minister, a faithful servant, and an honest man: and although he might have enriched his family at the expence of the public, yet he despised such meannesses, and died extremely poor. Lewis XV. king of France, with his son, the late dauphin, visited the cardinal in his last moments; and his dying advice to them was, to desist from any farther connections in the war.

His Britannic majesty, ever faithful in fulfilling such conventions as he entered into with his allies, resolved to visit the continent; and therefore, soon after the prorogation of the parliament, he set out for Hanover, where he arrived on the sixth of May, having first taken care of the internal peace of the nation, by appointing a regency to act, with plenary powers during, his absence.

The campaign had been opened this year sooner than usual. The queen of Hungary seemed to be in a prosperous state; for the French army had suffered considerably during the preceding winter, owing to the severity of the season, and the soldiers crowding themselves too near German stoves, filled with burning wood, the mortality among them became general, and vast numbers of them perished every day.

The emperor took the field with what forces he could raise, and seemed determined to act in the most vigorous manner; but prince Charles of Lorraine, having gathered together an army of Austrians, attacked the imperialists, and gave them a total overthrow. Besides prisoners, five thousand were left dead on the spot, and the whole baggage and artillery of the emperor fell into the hands of the Austrians. This victory opened a way for the Austrians to penetrate into Bavaria, and the towns in general surrendered on on their approach. The discomfited emperor was obliged to take shelter in Augsbürg, one of the imperial cities; but Mentzel, an Hungarian general, at the head of a strong body of Pandours, drove him from it, so that he was obliged to seek shelter in Frankfort.

The British forces, under the command of the earl of Stair, began their march from the Lower Germany in the month of February, and on the nineteenth of May were joined by the Hanoverian, near the town of Aix-la-Chapelle. From thence the earl of Stair continued his march to the neighbourhood of Frankfort, where the emperor then was, and to whom he sent a messenger to inform him, that his reason for marching into that part of Germany was to restore the peace of the empire, and that no disturbance should be given to him. The rest of the allies marched at the same time to join the earl of Stair, the whole amounting to about thirty-seven thousand men, encamped on the banks of the river Maine near Frankfort.

The French army, who expected that such measures would be taken, resolved to lose no time, and therefore, on the fourteenth of May, the marshal Noailles crossed the Rhine and reduced the allied army to great hardships for provisions. They even endeavoured to seize the town of Aschaffenburg, where there was a bridge over the Maine, but the vigilance of the earl of Stair prevented them from putting their intended project in execution. His Britannic majesty, accompanied by the duke of Cumberland and lord Carteret, arrived in the camp of the allied army on the nineteenth of June, and was received amidst the joyful acclamations of the soldiers. The same afternoon he reviewed the army, and found them in exceeding good order, after which he took up his residence in the palace of Aschaffenburg.

But although the presence of his Britannic majesty raised the spirits of the soldiers, yet the allied army was still in great distress; for the French had sent out parties to seize all the boats on the Maine, and which was still worse, the allies were in danger of being surrounded in their camp and made prisoners of war. In this distressed situation, news was brought to the king of England, that prince Charles of Lorraine had made himself master of the greatest part of Bavaria, and that a body of Hessians and Hanoverians were marching to join the allied army. This intelligence induced his Britannic majesty to decamp in the night of the twenty-sixth of June, in order to meet the auxiliary forces; for he was afraid, that had they continued their march much farther, they would have been surrounded and made prisoners by the French.

As soon as the French marshal learned that the allied army had left their camp, he looked upon their destruction as inevitable, and therefore ordered thirty squadrons of dragoons to cross the river and take post at the village of Dettingen, through which he knew they must pass. At the same time the marshal Noailles ordered four regiments of foot to march across two temporary bridges, and conceal themselves in a hollow way near the village of Dettingen, and the duke de Grammont, to whom the command of these forces was given, had orders not to attempt any thing, till such time as the allies should be hemmed in between the rising grounds, that there would be no possibility of their escaping. All the passes on the Maine had been secured by the French marshal, so that his Britannic majesty found himself reduced to the alternative of either fighting on the most unequal terms, or to surrender a prisoner of war, with his whole army. But all the precautions taken by the French general were rendered abortive by the precipitate conduct of the duke de Grammont, who, impatient of waiting any longer, advanced to a rising ground, and attacked the allies before the one half of them had passed the defile. Here the French were led into the same snare they had laid for their enemies; for their cannon, on the opposite side of the river, not being able to give the detached party any assistance, great numbers of the French were killed.

The marshal de Noailles having seen from the opposite banks of the river, the conduct of the duke de Grammont, marched to his assistance, but too late; for the allied army behaved with so much intrepidity, that the French were defeated with great slaughter, and that army which in the morning seemed devoted to destruction, was in possession of the field before evening. Indeed the conduct of his Britannic majesty, during the whole of the engagement, was consistent with the character of a great hero. He rode through the ranks, encouraging the men to exert themselves to the utmost, and they obeyed in the most cheerful manner. No troops ever behaved with greater bravery than the English, and some of their principal officers were killed, particularly general Clayton, who was shot dead by a random shot from a French cannon. General Monro, a brave Hanoverian officer shared the same fate; and the gallant duke of Cumberland, whose behaviour during the battle procured him the esteem of all present, was wounded in the leg, as were several other officers of the highest distinction.

It is certain, that whatever advantages were obtained on this occasion, they fell to the share of the English; but for all that, the French pretended they had obtained a complete victory. Few advantages, however, resulted from it other than opening a passage for the British forces; and accordingly his majesty continued his march to Hannau, where he was joined by the twelve thousand Hessians and Hanoverians, under the command of prince George of Hesse-Cassel.

The earl of Stair sent a messenger to the marshal de Noailles, recommending to his care such of the wounded soldiers and officers as had been left on the field of battle; and to the honour of the French let it be mentioned, that they treated them with the utmost tenderness.

The French army, removing from their camp near Frankfort, marched to a town called Offenbach, on the south side of the Maine, exactly opposite to Hannau, where his Britannic majesty, with the allied army, then lay encamped, and both continued for some time looking at each other.

In Bavaria prince Charles of Lorraine defeated the marshal de Broglie, and obliged him to retreat in the most precipitate manner. The emperor was reduced to such poverty, that he actually wanted provisions for his family, and must have discharged his domestics had not the marshal de Noailles lent him forty thousand crowns.

On the twelfth of July the marshal de Noailles received information that prince Charles of Lorraine was marching, at the head of a powerful army, to attack him, upon which he set fire to his magazines, and in four days arrived with the French army at Worms, near the Rhine. In the mean time prince Charles arrived at Hannau, where he was received in the most friendly manner by his Britannic majesty, and the plan of operations for the different armies, was agreed upon. The emperor, unable to support his dignity, wearied out with the fatigues of war, and feeling for the misery he had brought on his subjects, by being made a dupe to French councils, resolved to conclude a separate peace with the queen of Hungary; but the Austrian minister would hearken to no terms of accommodation. Many of the German princes began to consider the queen of Hungary as too inflexible, and, at the same time, they pitied the unfortunate emperor, who longed earnestly for peace. The two last places of importance in his dominions, viz. Egra and Ingolstadt, were taken by the enemy, and in the last mentioned were found the records and archives of the electorate of Bavaria, the family jewels, pictures, plate, curiosities, and most of the valuable things belonging to the Bavarian nobility, nobility. This was a fatal stroke to the emperor; and, to increase his misfortune, his kinsman and faithful counsellor, the archbishop of Mentz, was dead, and his successor was a friend to the Austrians. A protest was sent from the Austrian ministry against the election of the emperor, declaring it null and void; and the elector of Mentz, as high-chancellor of the empire, ordered it to be registered. This occasioned many disputes among the German princes, each party espousing the cause that suited their interests or inclinations; but the most sensible complained of the conduct of the Austrians, in not hearkening to terms of accommodation.

Among those who espoused the cause of the emperor, was the king of Prussia, who declared, that he could not behold with indifference the head of the empire treated in so indignant a manner. That prince finding that nothing could persuade the Austrian ministry to hearken to reason, went to Frankfort; where he had an interview with the emperor, which occasioned much speculation, especially as the Prussian monarch was convinced that no confidence could be put in the French; and the emperor's connections were such, that he could not, without great difficulty, disengage himself from them.

Such was the situation of affairs, when his Britannic majesty, at the head of the allied army, crossed the Rhine near Mentz, and established his head-quarters in the city of Worms; while marshal de Noailles retreated to Alsace, where he pitched his camp in the most safe and commodious manner. About the latter end of September, the allies marched from Worms to Spire, where they were joined by twenty thousand Dutch auxiliaries, who had marched from Holland.

The army was now considerably increased; and having taken every necessary precaution, they entered into winter quarters about the latter end of October; but the hussars and pandours, with other irregulars belonging to the Austrian army, penetrated into the dutchy of Lorrain, and ravaged it in the most cruel manner. Prince Charles of Lorrain, after an unsuccessful attempt to cross the Rhine, returned to the frontiers of Bavaria, where he distributed his troops into quarters of cantonment.

The earl of Stair, either displeased that his advice, in some things, had been rejected, or because the king shewed more respect to the foreign generals, desired leave to resign his command, and the king returned to Hanover.

In Italy, the king of Sardinia raised an army of forty thousand men, in order to oppose the Spaniards, who had taken possession of Savoy: but he was too inactive; for he rather remained on the defensive, than offered to attempt any thing of importance. Count de Gages, who commanded another army of Spaniards in Italy, transmitted accounts to Madrid, that he had lost, out of forty thousand men, above ten thousand by sickness: but the king of Spain, who was under the influence of his queen, sent peremptory orders to the count to engage; and accordingly he crossed the Panaro, and encamped in a place belonging to the pope, resolving to act some time on the defensive. He sent several pressing letters to the king of Naples, to send him a fresh reinforcement: but however willing that prince was to assist the Spaniards, yet he knew, that if he had sent them any part of his army, the English fleet would have battered down his capital.

In the month of September, prince Lobkowitz was sent to take the command of the Austrian army in Italy, and immediately resolved to take the field. Accordingly he marched against count Gages, who not having force sufficient to oppose him, retreated to Fano, a small town near the gulph of Venice; where he resolved to wait for the Austrians. He caused all the passes and avenues leading to the town to be fortified; but prince Lobkowitz, knowing that the place would naturally be given up on account of the scarcity of provisions, and not doubting but, before the expiration of the season, the Spanish army would be obliged to surrender prisoners of war, he did not offer to pursue them, but put his men into quarters.

The prince de Conti was sent, at the head of twelve thousand men, to reinforce the army in Savoy; under the command of Don Philip; and to these were added four thousand foot, drawn from the Spanish regiments in Catalonia. The design of sending these troops into Savoy, was to attempt to force a passage through the Alps, which had been attempted before by the marquis de las Minas, though without success, and three thousand of the Spanish soldiers were cut off. The united army of the French and Spaniards now amounted to fifty-six thousand men. As it was difficult to procure provisions for such a numerous body of men in the mountains of Savoy, where the poor peasants have scarce as much as will support themselves; it was resolved, in a council of war, to march to Chateau-Dauphine; but, after several unsuccessful attempts, they found themselves under the necessity of going into the same winter quarters they had occupied before: so that nothing of importance was done against his Sardinian majesty during the whole of that campaign.

In the Mediterranean, things remained in the same situation as the preceding year. Admiral Matthews had taken care to prevent the Spanish and French fleets from joining; but as the French resolved not to act any longer in an underhand manner, it was agreed, that the fleet blocked up in Toulon should be reinforced by some ships just finished in that harbour; while another squadron was to be fitted out at Brest, to intercept any reinforcements that might happen to be sent from England to the Mediterranean. But some ships belonging to the Spaniards being taken by Matthews, he found out the scheme laid to overpower him; and sent notice of it to the ministry, earnestly begging that they would send him more ships and men, the fleet being in a very miserable situation.

Sir Chaloner Ogle succeeded to the united command of the army and navy, in the room of general Wentworth and admiral Vernon, who had both been recalled home; but the Spanish admiral, de Torres, was still in the harbour of the Havannah, with a large fleet; so that it could not be expected that any thing of importance would be done.

Captain Knowles was sent, with a small squadron, to attack one of the Spanish settlements called Porto Cavallo; but the governor, either suspecting, or having some intelligence of the attempt that was to be made, caused the fortifications to be repaired; and Knowles, not being able to reduce the place, was obliged to sail for the island of Curacoa, belonging to the Dutch. A second attempt was made on the same place; but although twelve hundred men were landed, under the command of major Lucas, yet scarce had they begun the attack, when they fell into confusion, and were obliged to return to their ships.

On the continent of America, things were in no better a situation than in the West-Indies: for although general Oglethorpe undertook a long, fatiguing march, to prevent the Spaniards from penetrating into any of our provinces, yet he was obliged to return to Georgia, without having been able to do any thing of importance.

Having thus described the state of affairs abroad, we must now look back to England, where several things of importance happened that claim our immediate attention. In Scotland, a regiment of highlanders had been raised, under pretence that they were to act as militia in preserving the peace of the country: but being ordered up to London, they were reviewed on Finchley-cymmon by general Wade, and then told that they must embark at Gravesend. This they complained of, as inconsistent with the terms upon which they had been embodied; and therefore a large party mutinied, and set out, in order to return to their own country; but they were overtaken by a regiment of dragoons, and brought prisoners to the Tower, where three of them were shot, and the remainder sent to the West-Indies; while such as had continued obedient embarked for Flanders, and behaved, in several engagements, with great bravery. The princess Louisa of England being married, by proxy, to the prince-royal of Denmark, set out for that kingdom on the nineteenth of October, accompanied by the countess of Albemarle and baron Salenthall, a Danish nobleman. On the twenty-ninth, she arrived at Hanover, and, on the eighteenth of November, was met at Altena by the prince, where they were publicly married, and then continued their journey to Copenhagen, the capital, amidst the acclamations of the people.

His majesty being returned from Hanover, the parliament met on the first of December; and the king, in his speech, told them, that the situation of affairs on the continent had obliged him to head the army in person, where he had been joined by a large reinforcement from his good friends the Dutch: that, in order to restore peace to Europe, he had concluded a treaty with the queen of Hungary and the king of Sardinia, the particulars of which should be laid before them. He added, that it would appear to them, that he had nothing so much at heart as the restoring the public tranquillity: and concluded by telling the commons, that although the expence was great, yet it was necessary; and therefore he doubted not but they would contribute, in the most cheerful manner, to support the dignity of the crown, and promote the happiness of the people.

Great debates arose in the house of lords concerning the nature of the address that should be presented to his majesty: for the earl of Sandwich moved, that the Hanoverians should no longer be continued in the pay of Great-Britain, because they were of no real service to the nation.

The motion, however, was over-ruled by a great majority, and twenty-five peers protested against it. It was much the same in the house of commons: for although several members moved for the discontinuation of Hanoverians in the British service, yet the ministry carried all before them. That system of bribery that had been first planned by Sir Robert Walpole, and brought to a state of perfection during twenty years that he was at the head of public affairs, had made the majority of both houses a standing council to the crown; and thus the public money was spent in debauching the morals of the people.

This year John duke of Argyle died, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. He was one of the most steady patriots that ever adorned any nation whatever. No scheme proposed by the minister was ever embraced or supported by him, if it appeared to be inconsistent with the rights of the people. He had served the crown in some of the highest departments of the state; but neither promises nor threatenings could ever make him swerve from that duty he owed to his country. He lived an honest man, and died lamented by every lover of virtue.

A.D. 1744. The first thing that the parliament took into consideration, was the raising the proper supplies for carrying on the war; and so great was the power of the ministry, that ten millions were granted, a sum that increased the national debt to an enormous height, and burthened the people with taxes almost intolerable to be borne. Many worthy members of both houses opposed such scandalous measures, by which ruin was threatened to the whole nation. But their attention was led off by an event that called upon both parties to unite in the same common cause.

Charles Stuart, the eldest son of the pretender, had left Rome; and travelling through Italy in the most private manner, arrived in France, where he had a conference with the French king, who had invited him to Paris, in hopes of sending him over to Britain; not doubting but the discontents in that kingdom would enable him to procure a powerful party, and by these means lead the British forces out of Flanders. Accordingly, a body of troops was raised in France to assist him, and count Saxe was appointed the commander in chief.

Count Saxe had been some time in England, and had taken notice that there were but few places fortified in a regular manner; and therefore, upon his return, having made a proper representation of these things, an army of fifteen thousand men was ordered to march to the coast near Calais, Dunkirk, and Boulogne, where the young pretender was to see them embarked on board the proper transports. It is necessary to take notice, that although hostilities had, in some measure, been commenced between us and the French, yet war had not been declared; and therefore our ministry sent an express to Mr. Thompson, then at Paris, to remonstrate to the French ministry on their conduct; but he only received evasive answers. A fleet of men of war had been fitted out at Brest, as a convoy to the transports; and the command being given to M. Roquefeuille, that admiral sailed up the British channel, but was discovered by some English cruisers, who took shelter in the harbour of Plymouth, and sent an express to the board of admiralty. Sir John Norris was sent to take upon him the command of the fleet; and being joined by some other ships of the line, he found himself superior to the enemy.

The design of the French was to have landed their forces in Kent, and thereby strike such a terror into the people in London, that they would be obliged to abandon their houses; but the English ministry took every precaution to frustrate their designs. Several régiments were ordered to march towards the coast opposite France; proper care was taken of the forts, and the governors and commanders of garisons were ordered to repair to their respective stations. The militia were raised; the laws in force against the papists and non-jurors were ordered to be put in execution; and the earl of Stair was again appointed commander in chief of the army.

In the mean time, the French went on with their preparations for the embarkation of their forces; and seven thousand went on board at Dunkirk, while M. Roquefeuille attempted to get up the channel; but stopping near the Isle of Wight, he was informed that the English squadron had deserted their station. He sent Mr. De Barreil, his second in command, with two ships of the line, to hasten the embarkation at Dunkirk; while he set sail with the rest of the fleet, and came to an anchor at a place called Dungeness, eighteen miles south-west of Dover.

Sir John Norris, who had received information concerning the French fleet, set sail from the Downs, and would have come up with them, had not the wind shifted about, so that he was obliged to cast anchor within two leagues of the enemy. This induced the French admiral to call a council of war, and the result of it was, that they were to sail home to their own coast, because they had not force sufficient to oppose the English. Accordingly they weighed anchor; and a hard gale springing up, they arrived off Cape Barfleur in a very shattered condition. The transports in particular were so much distressed for want of necessary provisions, that many of the men were so extremely sick, that they were obliged to be landed; and this mighty armament, which had made so much noise, ended in nothing. The English remained masters of the seas; and Sir John Norris returned with his squadron to the Downs, from whence he detached several ships to annoy the enemy. The pretender, who, a few weeks before, supposed that he would be able to make himself master of England by conquest, was obliged to return to Rome; for the court of France, whose tool he was, looked upon him in a very cold and indifferent manner.

The suspicion of danger, in consequence of a foreign invasion, induced the parliament to set aside the habeas corpus act; and, in consequence thereof, several persons of distinction were taken into custody; but but no proof of their guilt appearing, the court of King's-bench admitted them to bail, and they were soon after discharged. On the eighteenth of March, six thousand Dutch forces arrived at Gravefend, in consequence of a former treaty; and the French king finding all his schemes rendered abortive, declared war against Great-Britain on the twentieth day of March. On the thirty-first day of the same month, his Britannic majesty published a counter-declaration of war, to the great joy of the nation; for the people in general had long beheld, with indignation, the insults daily offered to the British flag; while the most solemn treaties had been disregarded, and public faith, the basis of peace, trampled on.

War was, at the same time, declared against the queen of Hungary, by the French; so that nothing was to be seen but preparations for taking the field as early as possible. On the third of April, his majesty went to the house of peers; and, in a most pathetic speech, informed them, that, with respect to the event of the war, and the support of his faithful and loyal subjects, he depended on the divine providence. He told them, that he had not drawn the sword till forced to it; and that, as he had but one interest with his people, so he depended upon them for support. Affectionate and loyal addresses were presented by both houses to his majesty; and a bill was brought in, to make it high-treason in any British subject to correspond with the pretender. This bill having passed in the house of commons, was carried to the upper house, where the lord-chancellor Hardwicke moved, that an amendment should be made, by extending the act to the natural lives of the pretender's two sons. Debates arose upon the merits of the amendment; for it was argued, that however imprudent it might be in British subjects to correspond with such as had the most distant claim to the crown, yet it was inconsistent with humanity to make it criminal, particularly high-treason, the greatest offence that can be committed in the eye of the law. It passed, however, by a small majority, though not till eighteen lords had entered a protest against it: and when it was sent down to the commons, great opposition was made to the amendment by those who had framed the bill; but the court party carried it, and soon after it received the royal assent. The parliament was prorogued on the fifteenth of May, when his majesty told them, that the vast preparations then making by the French was a proof of their ambitious views, and therefore the safety of the nation depended on opposing them in the most vigorous manner: and he thanked the commons for their generosity in furnishing the supplies.

The fleet under the command of admiral Matthews had been strongly reinforced; for he had no less than forty vessels, twenty-eight of which were of the line. On board were fifteen thousand seamen, with eight hundred men drawn from the garrisons in Minorca. The French and Spanish fleets had been, for a considerable time, blocked up in the harbour of Toulon; but the queen of Spain, who could set no bounds to her ambition, stirred up the French to give absolute orders for their admirals to engage. Accordingly an express was dispatched to Toulon; and on the ninth of February this year, the combined fleet came out of the harbour; and admiral Matthews, who had watched all their motions, made the necessary preparations to attack them. Lestock commanded the left wing, or rear; Rowley the right, or van; and Matthews the center. But the wind dying away, they were obliged to come to an anchor. Next day, towards the evening, both fleets came very near to each other; but neither the French or Spanish admirals seemed willing to engage, because of the superior force of the English. However, the admiral resolved to lose no time, and therefore gave orders for a general attack; but Lestock kept back his ships, and suffered four of the Spanish ones to pass him. The captains Hawke, Cornwall, Osborne, and Forbes, behaved with the most unparalleled bravery; but some of the other captains acted in such a manner, as to be a dishonour to their country. Captain Cornwall commanded the Marlborough; and, after reducing the Real; the Spanish admiral's ship; to a perfect wreck, had both his legs shot off, and at last was killed by one of the enemy's chain-shot. The command having devolved upon the first lieutenant, the ship continued to fight till near five in the evening, when she was towed out of the fleet, as unfit for action. The Royal Philip, another Spanish ship, was so much disabled, that admiral Matthews ordered one of the fire-ships to burn her. These fire-ships are filled with gun-powder, and other combustibles, with grappling-irons on the fronts and sides, which fix them to the enemy's ships; and then the sailors getting into boats, set fire to them, when all blow up together. It is the constant practice to send one of the large ships to protect the fire-ship from being blown up by the enemy; and Matthews took that precaution, but the captain did not obey his orders. In the mean time, the brave captain Mackay, who commanded the fire-ship, though unsupported by any vessel whatever, continued to advance; and Lestock having suffered the Spaniards to advance, Mackay saw his destruction inevitable, and therefore resolved to lose his life in the destruction of the Royal Philip. In consequence of that desperate resolution, he got up along-side of the Spanish admiral's ship, and lighting a match, set fire to the combustibles, and was blown up, without doing any other damage to the enemy than covering their decks with the wreck. The Namur, in which admiral Matthews was, suffered much in this engagement; and had she not been assisted by the brave captain Hawke, in the Berwick, she must have been destroyed. Hawke took one of the Spanish ships of the line; but she was the next day retaken by the French, who finding that she was not fit for service, burnt her. Towards the evening, the French admiral, M. de Court, attacked that part of the fleet under the command of Rowley; and although Lestock was witness to this, yet he did not so much as offer him the least assistance. Night coming on, the firing ceased; but next morning, Matthews seeing the enemy to the leeward, continued in pursuit of them till dark. In the morning, the enemy's ships were discovered from the top-mast-head, and Lestock was sent in pursuit of them; but before he could come up with them, Matthews gave the signal for him to desist, and steered for the island of Minorca. The Spanish fleet, under the command of Don Navarro, got into the harbour of Carthage, and that of the French into Alicante.

As soon as Matthews arrived in Minorca, he deprived Lestock of his command, and sent him a prisoner to England. The public were much divided in their opinions concerning the conduct of the two commanders; but certain it is, they were men that, from motives of private resentment, sacrificed the public interest; so that, notwithstanding the vast expence the nation had been at in fitting out the fleet, and after many brave men had been killed, no advantages were reaped from an engagement which, if rightly conducted, would have been the destruction of the Spanish and French navies. Matthews having resigned his command of the fleet to admiral Rowley; and coming to England, was put under an arrest by order of the government. A committee of the house of commons was appointed to enquire into his conduct; and that of admiral Lestock; but they not being properly acquainted with the import of sea-terms, nor the form of naval engagements, presented an address to his majesty, praying that he would issue his warrant to a court-martial to try the delinquents. As is customary in such cases, many of the evidences were abroad; so that the court-martial did not deliver their judgment till the latter end of the year 1746, when Lestock was, to the surprise of every one, acquitted, and Matthews declared incapable of ever serving his majesty, and all his commissions were taken from him. People in general general blamed the court martial, nor is it fully known to this day, which of the commanders were most deserving of censure. Both were men of courage and abilities, but some private resentment operated so strongly upon their minds, that no good could be expected from any thing undertaken by them in concert.

The Mediterranean being thus in a manner left open, the Spaniards had an opportunity of sending forces and provisions to Italy, while Don Philip was supplied in the same manner by the French. The Sardinian army, which had hitherto only guarded the passes of the Alps, had sent a strong detachment to Nice, and that place being considered as of the utmost importance, Don Philip and the French general resolved to attack it. This was one of the boldest resolutions that could have been formed, because in that mountainous country a single battalion can stop a whole army; and what was still more, the king of Sardinia had formed a strong camp near Villa Franca, which seemed almost impregnable.

About the latter end of March Don Philip and the prince of Conti, having collected their forces together, crossed the Var, a river that runs from the Alps, and having taken the city of Nice, they advanced to attack the camp of the king of Sardinia in the midst of rocks and mountains almost inaccessible. A detachment from the forces on board the English fleet were sent to assist the king of Sardinia; but the French and Spaniards, animated by the example of the two young princes who commanded them, made themselves masters of the first lines that served as an advanced guard to the batteries of Villa Franca. Every thing gave way to the ardour of the French and Spanish troops, and although they lost above six thousand men, yet they proceeded from one rock to another, and made prisoner the marquis de Suze, natural brother to the king of Sardinia, and above three thousand men under his command. Another most furious attack was made on Montalban, a strong fort belonging to the king of Sardinia, and taken after an obstinate resistance; while the remainder of the Piedmontese army embarked on board the English fleet, and were landed at a town called Oneglia, seven miles south-west of Genoa.

A passage being thus opened into Italy, the Spaniards advanced to Oneglia, from whence the Piedmontese troops, under the command of general Sinzan, retreated and encamped at a place called Gareffio, situated among rocks almost inaccessible. But notwithstanding all the advantages obtained by the French and Spaniards, yet they were in great want of provisions in a country not capable of cultivation; and the artillery was obliged to be drawn by the soldiers. This induced the prince of Conti to propose to Don Philip, that, in order to preserve the army, they must endeavour to return to the borders of France; and accordingly, on the ninth of June, all the detached parties being called in, they crossed the Var, and soon after reached the Upper Dauphine, where they separated in order to prepare for entering Italy by Demont, and some other passes that were then guarded by his Sardinian majesty, who had taken every proper precaution, and although not an active general, yet displayed a large share of military skill in opposing the enemy.

On the eighteenth of July, early in the morning, the French and Spanish armies, having struck their tents, began to put in practice their intended scheme of forcing a passage into Italy, in a more advantageous manner than what had been attempted before. The undertaking was one of the most hazardous that could have been imagined, the Sardinian troops had every advantage on their side; but the French and Spaniards surmounted all difficulties, and took the pass of Monte Cavallo, although defended by a detachment of twelve hundred men. The French grenadiers leaped into the intrenchments, and by the favour of a fog, which prevented the enemy from discovering them, took one redoubt after another, though not without the loss of near four thousand men. The king of Sardinia, driven from his strong holds, resolved to collect all his forces together, and provide for the safety of his capital city of Turin. The French and Spanish armies, flushed with success, continued their march through defiles almost inaccessible, and the whole plain country of Piedmont being now laid open to them, they exacted heavy contributions from the people, and enforced the payment of them under the severest penalties.

Don Philip and the prince of Conti resolved to attack Coni, a strong fort about ten leagues south of Turin, and garrisoned by twelve hundred men, under the command of baron Leutrum, who had taken every necessary measure to put it in a proper state of defence, so as to preserve it to the last extremity. The king of Sardinia having been joined by the forces under general Pallavicini, found himself at the head of thirty-six thousand men, and conscious that if Coni fell into the hands of the enemy, they would soon be masters of Turin, his capital city, resolved to put the whole upon the hazard of a battle, a step much more consistent with sound policy, than to remain inactive. Accordingly, he marched to attack them in the intrenchments they had thrown up before the walls of Coni, but found it impracticable to bring them to a general engagement. The season of the year, however, seconded his operations; for the French and Spanish armies had suffered so much, that they were obliged to raise the siege, and march back to Dauphine, leaving their sick and wounded behind them to the mercy of the Piedmontese, and the whole country in possession of his Sardinian majesty.

In the more interior parts of Italy, the prince Lobkowitz carried on the war against the Spanish forces; and the king of Naples, having pulled off the mask, declared that he would assist his father the king of Spain; because, as he alledged, he had been treated in a very illegal manner by the courts of London and Vienna. He insinuated farther, that the queen of Hungary had attempted to raise an insurrection in his dominions, and that prince Lobkowitz was to assist in driving him out of his hereditary dominions. The army under count Gages had marched towards the Neapolitan territories, while the Austrians marched towards Rome; and it was resolved by the king of Naples, that both should come to a general engagement; and accordingly they came in sight of each other in the neighbourhood of Velletri, about twenty-seven miles east of Rome; where they threw up entrenchments. For some time they remained inactive; but prince Lobkowitz, having received intelligence that one wing of the Spanish army was quite uncovered, resolved to surprize it and seize on their head quarters in the town of Velletri, where their ammunition was kept.

This project was executed in such a manner as must for ever reflect honour upon the prince; for about midnight count Brown, having been sent at the head of six thousand Austrians, forced the advanced guards, and, entering the town, put all those whose opposed him to the sword, while such as submitted were made prisoners of war. The king of Naples and the duke of Modena, narrowly escaped being taken; but count Brown being afraid that his retreat would be cut off, marched out of the town, so that no beneficial consequences flowed from an enterprize so hazardous in its own nature, and so well conducted. As most of the Austrian soldiers had been taken from cold countries, so the climate of Italy did not agree with their constitution. The heat at autumn destroyed them in great numbers, and prince Lobkowitz, who imagined himself on the eve of victory, found his army daily decreasing. Count de Gages, who from the whole of his conduct, seems to have been a very experienced general, resolved to avail himself of the distressed condition of the Austrian Austrian army; and therefore, as soon as he heard that they had marched from Velletri, he resolved to harass them as much as possible. Accordingly he struck his tents; and coming up with the Austrians under the walls of Rome, where part of them had crossed the Tiber, and broke down the bridges, a smart engagement ensued, in which the Austrians were the greatest sufferers: at the same time, great numbers of their soldiers deserted, so that the prince's army was reduced to a handful of men; but notwithstanding, he made good his retreat, amidst a thousand difficulties. At Gabbio, in the territory of Bologna; he received information that the French and Spanish troops had been driven out of Italy, which gave fresh spirits to the forces under his command; and he put them into winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Imola, about one hundred and eighty miles north-west of Rome; while the count de Gages, unable to pursue him any farther, retired to Viterbo, on the east of Rome, and the winter was spent in making preparations for another campaign. Such was the state of affairs, with respect to military operations, in Italy, during this year; and therefore we must now turn our thoughts to another part of Europe.

In Germany, the emperor saw himself stripped of every thing, and reduced to the necessity of living on a pension from France; but even that distress became of service to him. Other princes beheld with indignation the inflexible spirit of the house of Austria, that would not hearken to any terms; and therefore the kings of Sweden and Prussia, with the elector Palatine, entered into a confederacy with France, in order to support the emperor, and trouble the queen of Hungary. A declaration of their intentions was published, with this view, that the people of England, seeing such a confederacy formed against the queen of Hungary, might be induced to withdraw from her any farther assistance. The king of Prussia sent an order to his ambassador at London to remonstrate to our court on the impropriety of distressing the head of the empire, and granting too much power to the house of Austria. This memorial was published in all our news-papers, and it convinced our ministry that the king of Prussia was well acquainted with the state of parties in England.

The king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, resolved to avail himself of the convention that had been formed against the house of Austria; and therefore he entered into an agreement with the queen of Hungary, to furnish her with thirty thousand men. In return, the queen was to give him a part of Silesia, to which he laid claim by an ancient title; for all the German princes have claims, or at least pretend to have, to each other's territories. But money was another motive with the king of Poland: he expected a subsidy from Britain; for most of the German princes are so poor, and live in such an extravagant manner, that they let out their troops to such as bid most for them.

The French king, determined to prosecute the war to the utmost, assembled an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men in the Netherlands, under the command of marshal de Noailles and count Saxe. Lewis XV. having heard that his army was assembled, set out from Paris, in order to be present during the campaign; for, from a variety of concurring circumstances, he doubted not of being successful.

On the fourth of May, the French king reviewed his army at Lille; and made several regulations relating to military discipline, which, for some time, had been too much neglected. The confederate army, composed of British, Dutch, Hanoverians, Hessians, and Austrians, amounting to about seventy-six thousand, encamped in the neighbourhood of Brussels, under the command of three different generals. Marshal Wade commanded the English and Hanoverians; the duke of Aremberg had the command of the Hungarians; and the Dutch under count Maurice of Nassau. These three generals were greatly esteemed by their respective sovereigns. Wade had been brought up under the great duke of Marlborough; Aremberg had served in many campaigns with prince Eugene; and count Maurice was descended from those heroes who had established the liberty of the united provinces. The only thing that tended towards retarding the progress of the allies, was the conduct of the Dutch: for although they had taken the field, yet they were very unwilling to engage; and therefore sent count de Walsenaer to Lewis, to expostulate with him on the terrors they were under, because of his army being so near the frontiers of their provinces. But the French king told the Dutch minister, that he had long borne with the insults of his enemies; but as his indulgence had only emboldened them in their designs against him, he was determined not to hearken to any terms, but to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour.

The city of Courtray surrendered at the approach of the French; and Menin, one of the Dutch frontier towns, in which was a garrison of fifteen hundred men, was taken, after a siege of four days, and both soldiers and officers made prisoners of war. Thirty thousand French, under the command of count Clermont, attacked Ypres, in which was a garrison of two thousand five hundred men, commanded by the prince of Hesse Philipsthal. The siege of this city began on the first of June, and continued till the fourteenth, when most of the outworks being taken, the governor was forced to capitulate. This important event opened a way for the French to penetrate into the center of the Austrian Netherlands, where the garrisons surrendered almost as soon as attacked.

The allies could not stop the progress of the French; and their generals beheld their towns taken, one after another, without being able to give them any assistance. The French king made his public entry into Dunkirk in the most pompous manner, imagining that every thing would give way to his arms; but news was brought him, that prince Charles of Lorraine had crossed the Rhine in sight of the French army, at the head of seventy thousand men; and had entered Alsace, after taking possession of the important pass of Lauterburg.

The conduct of prince Charles in crossing the Rhine did him great honour, and astonished all Europe, for it was looked upon as next to impossible; but the activity of the prince, and the perseverance of his troops, surmounted every difficulty. Marshal Coigni, who commanded the French army on the Rhine, saw with astonishment the Austrians in possession of Alsace, and the whole province of Lorraine laid open to prince Charles. He saw no other means left but that of cutting his way through the enemy, which he attempted, and a bloody battle ensued; but the French were defeated, and obliged to return to their former station; while flying parties infested the neighbourhood of Lorraine; and king Stanislaus, with his whole court, was obliged to retire from his capital city of Nancy. When news of this was brought to the French king, he did not hesitate one moment concerning the proper steps to be taken; but leaving an army of forty thousand men, under the command of marshal Saxe, to protect his new conquests in Flanders, he set out to join his army on the Rhine, accompanied by the marshal de Noailles, at the head of above fifty thousand men. Upon his arrival at Metz, in Lorraine, he received information that an event of the utmost importance had taken place, and drawn the attention of prince Charles to another part. The king of Prussia marched through Saxony into Bohemia, at the head of eighty-four thousand men, and a large train of artillery. On the frontiers of Bohemia, he was joined by twenty thousand men from Silesia; and on the twenty-fifth of August, he established his head-quarters at Peterwald, where he published a manifesto, in order to justify his conduct in having taken up arms against the house of Austria.

Having caused several copies of this memorial to be dispersed, he continued his march to Prague, which he invested: and having taken one fortification after another, the commander, general Ogilvy, surrendered, and fifteen thousand men were made prisoners of war. Having placed a garrison of six thousand men in Prague, he left that city, and reduced several other places in Bohemia. But conquests are more easily obtained than preserved.

News of the state of affairs in Bohemia having been transmitted to Vienna, orders were sent to prince Charles to repass the Rhine, which he did a second time in sight of the French army, although they were much superior to him in number. The king of France had been seized with a violent fever at Metz, and his life was, for some time, despaired of; but by proper care, and a good constitution, he recovered, to the great joy of his subjects, whose fears were consistent with that respect always shewn by the French to their sovereigns.

The king of Prussia no sooner heard that prince Charles had crossed the Rhine, than he complained bitterly of the French generals for not opposing him, but he only received evasive answers. In the mean time, prince Charles having been reinforced by twenty thousand Saxons, and a considerable number of Austrians under the command of general Bathiani, resolved to attack the Prussian monarch, well knowing that he was too far distant from his own territories to procure new reinforcements. Indeed, the king was sensible that it was not in his power to stand his ground in Bohemia; and therefore, having abandoned all the passes leading to Prague, he entered that city, to which he was closely pursued by the Austrians. On the nineteenth of November, he marched from Prague, leaving behind him his whole train of artillery; and so much did the Austrians harass his fatigued troops, and such was the severity of the season, that many died: and when he arrived in Silesia, the greatest part of the army were naked. Having distributed them into winter quarters, he returned to Berlin, mortified with his disappointment, and filled with indignation against the French state.

The affairs of Germany now began to assume a new form. Count Seckendorff had driven the Austrians out of Bavaria; and, on the twenty-second day of October, the emperor entered his capital city of Munich. The French marshals, Belleisle, Noailles, and Coigni, were at the head of eighty thousand men; and on the first of September, they invested the city of Friburg, a place of great strength, and still greater importance, as it opened a passage into the circle of Suabia. The French king, being perfectly restored to health, took into his service the famous count Lowendahl, and set out for his army at Friburg, where he arrived on the eleventh of October, amidst the acclamations of the soldiers, who rejoiced to see their sovereign once more restored to them. The trenches were immediately opened, and the garrison made a vigorous defence; but the superior power and knowledge of the French overcame every obstacle; and the place was surrendered on the twenty-eighth day of November, all the soldiers having been made prisoners of war.

This was a most valuable acquisition to the French, though it was dearly purchased, for they lost upwards of eighteen thousand men. In the arsenal they found three hundred pieces of cannon, seventy-two field-pieces, and two hundred mortars, with a suitable proportion of all other sorts of artillery and ammunition.

Thus ended the campaign in Germany; and the French troops were put into quarters of cantonnement along the banks of the Rhine, while their king returned to Paris, where he was received with such demonstrations of joy as had more the appearance of adoration paid to a divine being, than the homage due to an earthly sovereign.

In Flanders, the allies finding that the greatest part of the French army had been obliged to march to the Higher Germany, resolved to take the advantage of their absence: and accordingly, having crossed the Scheldt, a river that runs through great part of the Netherlands, attempted to force marshal Saxe to come to an engagement; but that general, ever cautious where he saw the least appearance of danger, kept himself behind his trenches, waiting for a more favourable opportunity.

The allied army finding they could not bring marshal Saxe to an engagement, filed off towards Lille, the capital of French Flanders, which they might have taken, but they neglected so valuable an opportunity, for which the conduct of the generals was severely censured in England. The truth is, the generals were divided in their opinions: Wade was too indolent to conduct any enterprize that required courage: the duke de Aremberg was afraid of giving umbrage to the French king, because great part of his estate lay in France: and the Dutch generals were as inactive as if they had not had any connection in the war.

The naval power of England in the Mediterranean had not performed any thing, during this year, of real service to the nation; and therefore it is necessary that we should turn our thoughts to commodore Anson, whom we have already mentioned as being sent on an expedition into the South-seas. In the month of January 1741, the commodore arrived in the bay of St. Indian, on the coast of Patagonia, where he called a council of war, in order to consult on the most proper methods to be used in distressing the enemy in that quarter of the world.

From St. Indian he sailed to the straits of La Maire, where he lost sight of the Severn and the Pearl, two of his ships; nor did he ever see them again during the remainder of his voyage; for they were so much shattered, that they were obliged to return to the Brazils to refit, and from thence they sailed for Europe. This induced the commodore to sail to the island of Juan Fernandez, where such of the men as had been long afflicted with the scurvy, recovered in a most surprising manner, that small place being esteemed one of the most healthy in the universe. The Wager, a ship of twenty guns, belonging to Anson's squadron, having been driven on the island of Socoro, the crew mutinied, and confined the captain, after which they converted the long-boat into a schooner, in which they set sail for the Brazils, where they arrived in the month of January 1742. The captain, with such of the men as had continued firm in his interest, had the good fortune to get on board a vessel that carried them to Chili, and from thence to St. Jago, the capital of Chili, where they remained till there was a cartel for the exchange of prisoners, when they were sent home to England.

Commodore Anson was now reduced to a most shocking condition, in a part of the world where he could not procure any assistance: and his small fleet consisted of no more than three ships, namely, the Centurion, the Gloucester, and the Anna, which last was loaded with provisions. But that fortitude and presence of mind that seemed to be the particular characteristic of Mr. Anson, never forsook him, even in the midst of the greatest dangers. He resolved to attack the city of Paita, where the Spaniards had a large sum of money, which they intended to send to Europe; and accordingly he ordered his lieutenant, Mr. Brett, to land in the night with only fifty-eight men; all which was accomplished without their being perceived by the enemy. Such was the consternation among the inhabitants, who imagined that a great army was landed among them, that, with the governor, they abandoned the place in the utmost confusion; while the English sailors seized on all the treasure, which they conveyed to their ships; and then the commodore sent some more of his hands on shore, who set fire to the town, and reduced it to an heap of ashes.

This was a most fatal stroke to the Spaniards, whose loss amounted to above fifteen hundred thousand land dollars: and the commodore having weighed anchor, set sail for the coasts of Mexico and California. His design was to intercept the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at sea, and destined for the harbour of Acapulco; but it was the nineteenth of February before Mr. Anson could get into the bay of Mexico. When he arrived there, he had the mortification to learn, that the Manilla ship had got into the harbour of Acapulco on the ninth day of January, and that she was to have sailed soon after; but no sooner had the Spanish governor learned that an English Squadron was in those seas, than he gave orders to countermand the sailing of the ship; so that the commodore saw no other method left to save his ships, than to cross the vast Pacific ocean, for the river of Canton in China. The Centurion and Gloucester were all the ships he had now left; for although he had taken several prizes, yet not having hands to navigate them in a proper manner, they were obliged to be sunk; while the Gloucester, soon after, having sprung a leak, was obliged to be set on fire; so that there remained none but the Centurion.

The hardships which the crew of the Centurion suffered are almost beyond conception; for so many of the men were afflicted with the scurvy, that there was scarce a sufficient number left to do the necessary duty. At last they made for the island of Tinian, in the vast Pacific ocean, where most of the crew recovered, but the whole number amounted to no more than seventy-one. Having taken in all sorts of necessary provisions, he once more put to sea, and arrived in the river of Canton in China on the twelfth day of November, after having suffered every thing that human nature could sustain. The governor of Canton sent an order to him, demanding the customary fees paid by all ships coming into that river: but he maintained the honour of the British flag, and insisted that he would never comply with any such terms. The governor was amazed when he heard in what a cool and deliberate manner the commodore delivered his answer; and sending for him on shore, they had a long conference together, the result of which was, that assistance was granted him to refit his ship, and take in proper provisions.

On the fifteenth of April 1743, he left China, with a fixed resolution of sailing in quest of one or more of the Manilla ships; and towards the latter end of May, arrived off Cape Espiritu Santo, in the island of Samal Mare, where the Manilla ships always pass in their voyage to Europe. There he lay by for some time; but on the twentieth of June, one of those rich vessels made her appearance, which added fresh spirits to the crew of the Centurion. The Spanish captain resolved not to give up his prize, and accordingly a warm engagement ensued; but the superior skill and undaunted courage of the English overcame every opposition: and although sixty-seven of the Spaniards were killed, yet commodore Anson lost only two men.

With this rich prize the commodore returned to Canton, where he refitted his ship; and being willing to taste the sweets of his native country, from which he had been so long secluded, he set sail for Europe, and on the eleventh of March 1744, arrived safe at the Cape of Good Hope. From thence he sailed for England, and arrived in safety at Spithead on the ninth of June, where the treasure was landed, and conducted to London by those brave seamen who had taken it.

The British fleet in the Mediterranean being in great distress for want of necessary stores, several vessels were sent, containing what was necessary, under the command of Sir Charles Hardy, who had with him eleven ships of the line. The weather obliging him to put into Lisbon, a fleet of French men of war from Brest cruised near the mouth of the Tagus, in order to intercept him. News of this having been transmitted to England, Sir John Balchen, with the admirals Stevens and Martin, were sent to relieve Sir Charles; and, if possible, destroy the French fleet. A Dutch fleet of twenty men of war, under the command of admiral Bacceliffet, joined our Squadron at Spithead; and having set sail on the seventh of August, they cast anchor near the mouth of the Tagus on the ninth of September. The French admiral retired as soon as he heard of their approach, upon which the sea was left open to Sir Charles, who proceeded on his voyage without interruption.

So far the British fleet was prosperous; but, upon their return home, in the night of the third of October, they were overtaken by a most dreadful storm, and the Victory, carrying one hundred and ten guns, and esteemed the best first-rate ship in Europe, was dashed to pieces on a rock near the island of Alderney. Sir John Balchen, with all his officers, and every one of the crew, amounting to near twelve hundred men, besides above fifty young gentlemen of the best families in the nation, who had gone volunteers, perished, without any person's being able to give them the least assistance. Some other events took place during this year which must not be omitted. A small Squadron was sent to the East-Indies, to protect our settlements in that part of the world; and many of the French ships were taken; so that money flowed in abundance among the sailors.

Another Squadron, under the command of commodore Warren, was stationed to protect the leeward islands; and, in consequence thereof, the French ships, destined with provisions for the island of Martinico, were taken, and the inhabitants reduced to the utmost distress. A most dreadful hurricane happened on the twentieth day of October, in the island of Jamaica, by which six ships of war, besides near a hundred of the merchantmen, were totally destroyed. In general, the British cruizers were extremely fortunate; and although some of them were taken, yet, at the conclusion of the year, the balance in our favour against Spain was one million nine hundred thousand pounds; and against France, seven hundred and seventy thousand pounds.

This year died Sarah, the celebrated dutchess of Marlborough; a woman who, from a very obscure original, raised herself, by intriguing with the political parties, to the highest station that a subject could arrive at. She possessed great abilities, with an unbounded ambition; but so artful in the use of money, that she left behind her a most princely estate.

The marshal de Belleisle and his brother having, on the second of December, in their journey to the Imperial court, stopped at a village called Elbingrode, belonging to Hanover, of which they were ignorant, a party of the allied army took them both prisoners, and conveyed them to Stade, from whence they were sent over to England. They were treated with that respect due to their rank; and being on their parole of honour, were suffered to reside at Windsor, and enjoy all sorts of public diversions.

On the twenty-eighth of November, the parliament met; and the king, in his speech, informed them, that although nothing of importance, in favour of the allies, had happened; yet he was determined, in consequence of the assistance of his parliament, to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour. He told them, that nothing could so much contribute towards promoting the public tranquillity, as unanimity among the members; and concluded by recommending to them the obligations they were under to raise the proper supplies. Both lords and commons voted, that loyal addresses should be presented to his majesty; and, in general, the public business went on without interruption.

A considerable change took place in the ministry; for the patriots were so clamorous against lord Carteret, now become earl Granville, in consequence of his mother's death, that he resigned all his places; and the duke of Bedford was appointed first lord of the treasury; the seals were given to the earl of Harrington, as secretary of state; the privy seal to lord Gower; the earl of Chesterfield was sent over to the Hague, Hague, to prevail with the states-general to act more heartily in support of the common cause; and, upon his return, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Dorset was made president of the council, the duke of Devonshire steward of the household, Mr. Doddington treasurer of the navy, Sir John Phillips was made first lord of trade, and Mr. Lyttleton was brought into the treasury.

A. D. 1745. These noblemen and gentlemen were strongly attached to the interests of the queen of Hungary, and therefore it was resolved to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour; but still there was a general wanting to conduct the army. Some of the oldest in command refused to take the office upon them, for this reason, that the ministry would not fail to wreak their vengeance upon them in consequence of the least miscarriage: so that the duke of Cumberland, youngest son of his majesty, was appointed commander in chief of the British forces. This choice of a prince brought up in the army, and who had, on many occasions, given distinguishing proofs of his courage, gave great satisfaction to the people in general; and therefore he set out for Flanders. Many excellent bills having passed both houses, the king prorogued the parliament on the second of May, and next day embarked at Gravesend, in order to visit Hanover.

During these transactions in England, the French were daily gaining ground; and, notwithstanding some considerable losses, yet they seemed to rise superior to them. The queen of Hungary was much reduced, in consequence of having spent great sums in supporting her army; so that the eyes of all Europe were turned upon the event of the war. But many of the plans formed by the contending parties were near being disconcerted, in consequence of the death of Charles VII. emperor of Germany, and elector of Bavaria. That monarch, who had been advanced to the imperial dignity by the intrigues of the French, enjoyed little more than the name of emperor; and it may justly be said of him, that he died of a broken heart. He had seen himself neglected, and even despised, by those who, consistent with the faith of treaties, were bound to stand by him. His hereditary dominions were wrested from him; his enemies triumphed over him in every quarter: he saw his family on the brink of ruin; and, unable to sustain the weight of his sufferings, he sunk under the load, and died, leaving to succeeding monarchs a striking lesson, never to let ambition blind their understanding, to trust in those in whom no confidence ought to be placed. When he was buried, the globe was carried before him, as if he had been the sovereign of the whole world, although he had scarce a house wherein he could rest in safety. Such is the vanity of men's actions and views in general, who love the shadow more than the substance, and even rejoice in their own folly.

The death of the emperor, who had, in a great measure, been the cause of the war, induced people in general to hope that peace would be restored to Europe; but the English ministry refused all proposals of accommodation, thinking that they would have it in their power to distress the French, by carrying on the war in the most vigorous manner. The French, in order to play off their old game of interfering with the election of an emperor, cast their eyes on the king of Poland, elector of Saxony; but that prince was persuaded against embarking in such a dangerous scheme, by his minister, count Bruhl, who represented to him, that the Poles would never submit to an emperor of Germany, lest he should deprive them of their privileges: and as the interest of the grand duke was very great, so, by an act of so imprudent a nature, he might even lose his hereditary dominions. All these arguments were enforced from the example of the late emperor; and therefore the king of Poland, instead of aspiring to the imperial crown, did every thing he could to place it on the head of the grand duke.

The next object that France had in view, was to raise the king of Prussia to the empire; but he was so well convinced of their perfidy, that he treated all their proposals of that nature with the most sovereign contempt. On the other hand, the queen of Hungary, who had still some hopes of recovering Silesia, would hearken to no terms of accommodation; and in that she was strongly encouraged by the English ministry, who made her the most liberal promises, that nothing should be wanting to enable her to regain such of her territories as had been seized by the French, and, at the same time, to raise her husband, the grand duke, to the imperial throne.

Lewis XV. finding all his proposals rejected, and not seeing the most distant appearance of putting an end to the war, resolved to push it on, with the utmost vigour, in Flanders; and accordingly sent marshal Saxe to take upon him the command of the army, consisting of about seventy-six thousand men, assisted with a large train of artillery.

To animate the troops, the French king set out, accompanied by his son the dauphin, then about sixteen years of age, and arrived in Flanders before the two armies could come to a general engagement. The duke of Cumberland, just entering into the twenty-fourth year of his age, arrived at the Hague on the seventh of April; and having concerted proper measures with the states-general, set out for Brussels, where he found prince Waldeck, general of the Dutch forces, and the count Konigsfegg, the commander in chief of the Austrians. The duke had made the art of war his study from his most early youth; he was not afraid of the greatest dangers; and although he knew that the French were superior to him in numbers, yet such was his opinion of the undaunted courage of the English, that he seemed to despise the French, who were commanded by some of the most experienced generals of that age. Some of them had served above forty years in the army; they had reduced the art of war to a science; and even the subaltern officers were able to conduct any engagement whatever.

Marshal Saxe, one of the greatest generals that ever commanded an army, was not ignorant of the youthful ardour of the duke of Cumberland; but, at the same time, knowing that the troops under him were men of the most invincible courage, resolved to obtain by stratagem what he could not in a regular engagement. Accordingly, for some days, he marched from one place to another, concealing his real intentions; but, on the twenty-fourth day of April, he sat down before Tournay, a strong city on the river Schelde, defended by a garrison of eight thousand Dutch troops, under the command of baron Dorth. Tournay had been fortified by the great Vauban, and was esteemed the strongest of all the frontier towns belonging to the Dutch; so that the duke of Cumberland imagined, if he could raise the siege, it would be of the utmost service to the common cause. Accordingly, he marched from Brussels, and on the twenty-ninth of April, came within musket-shot of the French army, just as marshal Saxe had expected; for the whole was a scheme laid by the French to draw the allies into a snare.

The French army was strongly encamped; and between them and the allies was the village of Fontenoy, about three miles south-east of Tournay. On the twenty-eighth of April, the French king rode from the city of Douay, and took up his headquarters at the bridge of Calonne, near the village of St. Antoin; where there was a strong battery of cannon. The bridge of Calonne was guarded by several battalions, both of regulars and militia; so that every precaution was taken by the French, while the allies depended too much on personal courage.

That part of the allied army composed of English forces was employed to drive the French from their advanced posts, which they did with great courage; but this only served to make the enemy more formidable, by being more united. As the allies were now in possession of the ground from which they had driven the French, they drew up on it, and a council of war being called, it was resolved upon by the majority to engage the next morning. This opinion, however, was disliked by the oldest generals, who thought it much better to act on the defensive; but the opinion of the young ones was embraced.

As this was one of the most obstinate and bloody engagements that we meet with in history, so it is necessary that an account should be given of it in the most particular manner.

The English and Hanoverians composed the right wing, and were drawn up in four lines, having the village of Vezon in their front. The Dutch, with part of the Austrians, composed the left wing, consisting of three columns, and they advanced into the plain of Fontenoy. Prince Waldeck, with some of the best Dutch troops, proposed to attack Fontenoy; and the duke of Cumberland, in order to second the prince, ordered general Ingoldsbys to attack a fort near the village of Vezon, on which was a strong battery of cannon. Sir John (since earl) Ligonier, commanded the right wing of the infantry, and Sir James Campbell was ordered to cover him, by extending the cavalry as far as possible along the plain of Fontenoy.

The courage of the British forces on this memorable day is incredible; for at the first charge they drove the French beyond their lines, and would have penetrated into the center of their first line, had not marshal Saxe opened a concealed battery which swept off whole ranks at a time. The intrepidity of the British foot struck the French with amazement; and there is not the least reason to doubt, but they would have been masters of the field had not some circumstances conspired to deprive them of that glory.

General Ingoldsbys was so dilatory in attacking the fort at Vezon, that marshal Saxe had time to strengthen it both with troops and cannon. But the most fatal circumstance was the Dutch troops under prince Waldeck, for although he led them thrice on to the attack of Fontenoy, yet they as often fled, by which the Austrians were left exposed to the fire of the enemy. Had Ingoldsbys taken the fort at Vezon, the French king and his son, the dauphin, would have been made prisoners of war. But still the courage of the English was the most surprizing that can be imagined. The broken lines were filled up from the rear, and although once put into some disorder, yet when rallied by the duke, they advanced a second time with more ardour than ever. In this manner both armies continued on the first day of May, from five in the morning till about three in the afternoon; but the English, who received no assistance from the left wing, were so galled by the enemy, who, in consequence of the cowardice of the Dutch, took them in front and flank. Their numbers were now greatly reduced, and the French were raising a new battery, when orders were given for the allies to retreat. This they performed in such excellent order, that some of the French cavalry, who attempted to pursue them, had a whole regiment destroyed. Next day the allies marched to Aeth; but such of the brave soldiers and officers as had been wounded, were obliged to be left to the care of the enemy, who treated them in the most tender manner.

Such was the memorable battle of Fontenoy, which was of no other service to the nation, but that of making an ostentatious display of courage of the English and Hanoverians, who both fought in the most amazing manner; while the Dutch, to their everlasting disgrace, procured the loss of the battle. The allies lost in this action two brave generals, namely, Sir James Campbell, and major-general Ponsonby, three colonels, a great number of subaltern officers, with about eight thousand men. The loss of the French cannot be well ascertained: but it must be considerable, because seven of their generals were killed, and four others died soon afterwards of their wounds.

Baron Dorth, the Dutch commander in Tournay, held out that important fortress against the whole French army till the twenty-first day of June, when he was obliged to capitulate, and obtained the most honourable terms. A detachment of four thousand English and Hanoverians were sent to reinforce the garrison in the city of Ghent, but one thousand of them were cut off. At the same time the French took the cities of Aeth, Dendermond, Oudenarde, and Newport, with the important town of Ostend; after which Lewis XV. the French king, returned in triumph to Paris.

It was impossible for the duke of Cumberland to do any thing more than act on the defensive; and to crown our misfortunes, an unnatural rebellion broke out at home, which obliged the duke of Cumberland to return to England, leaving the victorious marshal Saxe in possession of the greatest part of the Austrian Netherlands.

In Germany the French had sent an army to the assistance of the young elector of Bavaria; but the Austrians had been so strongly reinforced that the elector was obliged to leave his capital city of Munich, and take shelter in Augsburg, while all that his army could do was to act on the defensive, till such time as reinforcements came to their assistance.

Count Traun, with an army of thirty thousand Austrians, marched from Bohemia towards Frankfort, in order to drive out the French, under the command of the prince of Conti; alledging, as a reason, that there could not be a free election of an emperor, till all foreign troops were driven out of the empire. Count Bathiani joined count Traun; and the whole Austrian army, amounting to near seventy thousand men, took the field, and the grand duke having taken upon himself the chief command, marched against the prince of Conti, and obliged him to repass the Rhine with very great loss.

The French being thus driven out of Frankfort, seven ambassadors, from so many electors, assembled in the Imperial college, to make choice of an emperor; but those of Brandenburg and the Palatinate were not present. The election fell on the grand duke of Tuscany, husband to the queen of Hungary; and on the twenty-fourth of September the emperor was crowned with the usual ceremonies. This important event, so much for the benefit of the princes in Germany, was, in a great measure, brought about by the unwearied assiduity of his Britannic majesty, who left nothing undone to bring over the electors to the interest of the house of Austria, and prevailed upon the prince of Hesse-Cassel, to withdraw his troops from the French service, and enter them into British pay.

The king of Prussia, who had suffered so much the preceding year, would have listened to terms of accommodation, especially as he found that he had been deceived by the French; but the house of Austria rejected every offer. The Austrians had taken some towns in Silesia; but no sooner had the king of Prussia learned that his proposal had been rejected, than his indignation was fired, and all his military skill rekindled in his breast. In a sudden he attacked the Austrians, and drove them from one post to another with great slaughter, besides making many prisoners. At Glatz six thousand Prussians, under general Lehwald, attacked twelve thousand Austrians commanded by general Helfrich, and totally defeated them. At Ratibor, three thousand Austrians were made prisoners of war; every thing gave way to the victorious Prussians to the surprise of all Europe. People in general imagined that he had been too much dispirited by his losses to have undertaken things of such importance; but there are particular reasons that call forth great minds to action.

But all these advantages obtained by the Prussian monarch, were trifles to what he performed afterwards. His real character had been hitherto concealed, and his taking Silesia was ascribed by the Austrians rather to a fortuitous concurrence of events; than either to real courage or military skill.

In May, prince Charles of Lorraine being joined by the forces under the command of the prince of Saxe-Weissenfels, marched from Bohemia, and encamped on those mountains which separate that kingdom from Silesia. The king of Prussia had taken all the precaution that the greatest general could use, in order to augment his army, and secure his garrisons: and about the middle of June, he found himself at the head of eighty-four thousand men, all disciplined in the best manner, and accustomed to the greatest hardships that can be imagined. With these men he resolved to attack prince Charles, who had advanced to Friedburg; and for that purpose ordered Du Moulin, his general, to march, at the head of fifteen thousand men, to make as if he intended to march towards Breslaw, which was done that prince Charles might be led into a snare. This stratagem had the desired effect; for the Austrians being taken off their guard, and lulled into security, the Prussians attacked them with such fury, that although prince Charles and the prince of Saxe-Weissenfels did all that lay in their power to procure a victory, yet the military abilities of the king of Prussia bore down every opposition, and the Austrians were totally defeated, with the loss of five thousand men killed, and near seven thousand taken prisoners.

His Britannic majesty was then at Hanover; and being afraid that the king of Prussia would too much distress the house of Austria, entered into a treaty with him, which was concluded at Hanover in the month of August. By this treaty Great-Britain engaged to support the king of Prussia in his conquest of Silesia; but the courts of Vienna and Dresden having protested against it, the king of Prussia marched into Lusatia, and having taken possession of Górlitz, forced prince Charles of Lorraine to take shelter in Bohemia.

The prince of Anhalt-Deffau, one of the Prussian generals, entered Saxony at the same time, and made himself master of the city of Leipzig; while the king of Poland, afraid of being made a prisoner in his capital city, left Dresden, and took refuge in Prague. Prince Lobkowitz, with a body of Saxons, attempted to force the Prussian lines, but he was defeated with great loss, and Dresden, the capital of Saxony, was obliged to submit to the victorious king of Prussia. The king of Poland seeing the Prussians in possession of his capital, was obliged to make peace on the best terms he could, and the queen of Hungary consented to give up all future claim to Silesia.

In Italy, during this year, the war had been very unfavourable to the queen of Hungary, and her ally, the king of Sardinia. In the month of April, count Gages crossed the Appenine mountains, in order to join the army under the command of Don Philip, in Lombardy; and although he was opposed by several parties of Austrians, yet he proceeded as far as Lucca, and placed a Spanish garrison in that city.

From Lucca count Gages continued his march to the eastern part of the Genoese territories: and on the fourteenth day of June, Don Philip, who had received fresh reinforcements from Catalonia, met him near the city of Genoa. Upon the junction of the two armies, the republic of Genoa declared in favour of France and Spain against the house of Austria and the king of Sardinia; and the Austrian general Schuylemberg found himself under the necessity of marching towards Milan, the capital city of Lombardy.

Count Gages reduced the fort of Serravalle, while Don Philip opened a passage to Alexandria, and obliged the Austrian general to retire beyond the river Tanaro. Pavia, Tortona, and some other places, submitted to count Gages; and Don Philip took the rich city of Milan, with Parma and Placentia; while the king of Sardinia was obliged to seek shelter at Valenza, on the other side of the Po, a rapid river that oftentimes overflows its banks, and lays the neighbouring country under water. The city of Alexandria submitted to the Spaniards, after a siege of twelve days: and soon after, prince Lichtenstein was sent to command the Austrian forces in Italy, but nothing of any importance was done by him; for the united forces of the French, Spaniards, and Neapolitans, carried all before them; and the Austrian dominions in Italy, as well as the greatest part of the king of Sardinia's territories, were taken.

With respect to the naval affairs of England during this year, they began, in some measure, to wear a more promising aspect than before. Admiral Rowley had been sent into the Mediterranean, to command in the room of Matthews; and he, during the summer, bombarded Genoa, and several other places; while the English privateers took several capital prizes; all which contributed towards inspiring the seamen with fresh courage. But the most important naval transaction was the reduction of Cape Breton, in North-America, a place of great importance, which the French had been at great expence in fortifying, and which they looked upon as one of their most valuable colonies. The scheme had been projected by the people of Boston in New-England; and Sir Peter Warren, who had been stationed near the leeward islands, was ordered to sail for North-America, to assist such forces as were then in New-England in the intended expedition. Accordingly, on the sixth of April this year, Sir Peter set sail, and soon after landed at Causo, having under his command ten ships of the line; and having taken on board six thousand men from New-England, he came to an anchor at Gabaron, about four miles south of Louisbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. The ground between the fort and the place where they landed was the most dangerous to pass over that could be imagined; but the forces sent from New-England surmounted all difficulties, and, by the most unwearied diligence and perseverance, formed two camps, in order to carry on the attack. One of these camps was on the north, and the other on the south side of the town; and the fort had a battery of thirty-five pieces of cannon, which commanded the entry into the harbour. The walls and ramparts mounted sixty-four great guns, besides sixteen large mortars; and the garrison, besides the inhabitants, contained twelve hundred regular troops, under the command of M. Chambon. At the west gate of the town, was a strong draw-bridge, secured by a battery of sixteen guns, and near it was another battery of thirty-four guns. The New-England forces were only raw, undisciplined troops; few of them had ever seen a military engagement: but notwithstanding the almost unsurmountable difficulties that seemed to oppose them, yet they displayed such courage as would have done honour to the best regulated forces in the world. They only waited for orders; and no sooner had they received them, than they attacked the grand battery with such fury, that the enemy was forced to abandon it, and that, in a great measure, contributed towards procuring them the victory. In the mean time, the English fleet blocked up the harbour, so that neither men nor provisions could be brought to the besieged; while several French ships, laden with stores and ammunition, fell into the hands of the English, and were condemned as legal prizes.

The New-England forces, who carried on the siege, were plentifully supplied with all sorts of fresh provisions; but the service on the south side of the town was attended with many difficulties; for most of the cannon designed to be placed on the battlements, were obliged to be dragged above two miles, through very marshy grounds; in some parts almost impassable. Perseverance and courage, however, surmounted every difficulty; and the troops that had been considered as unfit for action in a regular manner, performed wonders. Several batteries were erected on the rising ground near the place, from whence red-hot hot bullets were discharged into the town, and the governor not seeing any prospect of assistance, surrendered the place, and with the garrison, who all engaged not to bear arms against Britain, during the space of twelve months, were conveyed to Rochfort in France. This was a most valuable acquisition to Great Britain; and his majesty was so sensible of it, that he conferred several honours upon the officers. The inhabitants of New England acquired immortal honour, and convinced those in power, that courage, joined with prudence, is able to accomplish any thing.

It is now time for us to turn our thoughts to Great Britain, where a rebellion broke out that threatened immediate destruction to our civil and religious liberties. But although many individuals were ruined by it, yet in the end it was attended with the most salutary consequences to the nation. It awakened the British legislature to take into consideration the nature of the feudal law in Scotland, and by putting an end to the hereditary jurisdictions, by which the power of the landholders over their tenants was destroyed, the royal family of Hanover was more firmly established; on the British throne than ever, while those who had been considered as slaves were now treated as free members of the community.

We have already seen in what manner Charles, the eldest son of the pretender, attempted to invade England during the last year, and it is asserted, that upon his return home to his father at Rome, he was advised to lay aside all thoughts of engaging in an enterprise likely to be attended with insurmountable difficulties, and if failing of success must involve many families in ruin. Such was the advice given Charles by his father, who had failed in an attempt of the like nature; but the young adventurer, whose mind was full of romantic notions, and who had been hurried on by the advice of some needy fugitives, resolved to try his fortune for the recovery of that crown which he looked upon as the right of his family. The French ministry looked on the whole as a Don Quixote expedition, and however earnest they were to see Great Britain distressed, yet such were their notions of the superiority gained by them in Flanders, that all Charles could procure from them was only one ship of war to carry him over to Scotland, where he doubted not of meeting with many friends to espouse his cause. Accordingly, he set sail in a small frigate from Port St. Lazaro, on the fourteenth of July, and was joined by the Elizabeth, a French man of war of sixty guns, which was to serve as a convoy. Their design was to have sailed round Ireland, and then land in the Western Islands of Scotland; but happening to fall in with the Lion, an English man of war of fifty guns, a desperate engagement ensued, and the French ship was so much disabled, that she was obliged to set sail for Brest, where she arrived in a very shattered condition. The frigate, in which was the young chevalier, the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Thomas Sherridan, and some few others, made her escape during the engagement, and sailing up the channel came to an anchor on the twenty-seventh of the same month, landed at Moidart, between the islands of Sky and Mull, where he was kindly received by Mr. McDonald of Moidart, and concealed in his house till notice of his arrival was dispersed among the rest of the clans. Notice of his sailing from France was given, and a reward of thirty thousand pounds offered for apprehending him; but few people would believe that he had landed, because they did not imagine that any but a madman would have engaged in so romantic an expedition.

On the third of August his Britannic majesty arrived in London from his German dominions, to the great satisfaction of his loyal subjects, who received him with every demonstration of joy. Every precaution was taken by his majesty to crush the rebellion before it had spread too far. The lord-mayor of London was ordered to keep the trained-bands in readiness; the high-steward of Westminster arrayed the militia; orders for the same purpose were sent to the lords-lieutenants of the different counties; nine battalions of the army were ordered over from Flanders; and six thousand Dutch troops were demanded in consequence of former treaties.

As soon as it was known at Edinburgh that the pretender's son had landed, Sir John Cope, commander in chief of the forces in Scotland, marched to oppose the rebels; but they gave him the slip, and on the fourth of September arrived at Perth, where they proclaimed the pretender by the name of James III. and a commission was read, importing, that Charles his eldest son, was to act as regent for him. There the young chevalier was joined by lord George Murray, the person called the duke of Perth, lord Nairn, lord Strathallen, and many other persons of distinction, with their dependents and tenants, so that the rebel army was now about two thousand strong; but it must be remembered that not one fifth of them had either arms or ammunition. From Perth they marched south-west to the banks of the Forth, a few miles above Stirling, where they crossed that river, and on the seventeenth of September took possession of Edinburgh without the least opposition. Had the magistrates of that city been unanimous in their opinions, the rebels might have been kept out till the arrival of the forces under Cope; but they spent the time in unnecessary deliberations, without doing any thing of importance.

On the same day that the rebels took possession of Edinburgh, general Cope, who had embarked his forces at Aberdeen, landed at Dunbar, twenty-seven miles east of Edinburgh, where he was joined by two regiments of dragoons under the command of the brave colonel Gardiner. The rebels, knowing that no time was to be lost, marched to meet general Cope, and on the twentieth of September encamped at a place called Trapent, about seven miles east of Edinburgh. Next morning about day break, the rebels, who had got about two thousand sets of arms at Edinburgh, attacked the royal army with such fury, that they were obliged to give way, and many of them were made prisoners. In this engagement colonel Gardiner, a man of great piety and a valiant foldier, lost his life, after he had done every thing in defence of the rights of his country; and the baggage, arms, and ammunition falling into the hands of the rebels, they became so much elated that they doubted not of carrying every thing before them. The consternation that took place among all ranks of people when the news of this engagement was made public, is scarce possible to be conceived; but to the honour of the British subjects in general, both in England and Scotland, they gave their sovereign all the proofs of their loyalty that could be desired.

General Gueft, an officer of great knowledge and courage, commanded in the castle of Edinburgh, to which the archives of the city and the money in the public offices had been removed; and that castle being a place of great strength, the rebels could not get possession of it.

Marshal Wade, at the head of about fourteen thousand men, marched northwards into Yorkshire, and from thence to Newcastle on Tyne, where he encamped; but as most of the men had contracted dangerous disorders in Flanders, so the greatest part of the army was seized with sickness, and rendered incapable of acting, especially as the season was then extremely cold.

On the sixteenth of October the parliament met, and his majesty in his speech told them, that an unnatural rebellion had broke out in Scotland, and therefore he doubted not but they would assist him in restoring peace to the nation, and in supporting the honour of his crown and dignity. Addresses containing the warmest expressions of loyalty were presented by both houses to his majesty; and the commons, in order to provide for the public safety, suspended the habeas corpus act, upon which several suspected suspected persons were taken into custody. Admiral Vernon was sent to command a fleet in the Downs, there being great reason to suspect that the French would attempt to invade the south of Kent, and his ships seized several French vessels which were carrying arms and ammunition to the pretender in Scotland. This was striking at the root of the rebellion, and from such circumstances our ministry were enabled to form some notion of their strength, and the methods to be used in opposing them.

The chevalier, finding it impracticable to seize the castle of Edinburgh, marched towards England at the head of five thousand men; for after the defeat of general Cope, his army had increased considerably. On the twelfth of November the rebel army attacked the city of Carlisle, and in three days it surrendered; all the arms and ammunition falling into their hands, and there the pretender was proclaimed. Thus successful, and marshal Wade not having been able to get up in time to oppose them, they marched southward to Preston, where they arrived without any molestation; and on the twenty-ninth made their public entry into Manchester. At Preston and Manchester the pretender was again proclaimed; and in the latter place a regiment was raised for him, and the command thereof given to one Mr. Townly, a Lancashire gentleman, who had been some years in the French service. It is impossible to express the consternation of the people in London, when they found that the rebels had got so far southward; and therefore the duke of Cumberland, who had returned from Flanders, was sent down to oppose them.

The rebels, having marched from Manchester, arrived at Derby on the fourth of December; but finding that the duke of Cumberland was advanced as far as Newcastle under line in Staffordshire, they suddenly retreated and marched northward. The duke pursued them with the cavalry and one thousand foot, whom he mounted on such horses as could be procured in the country; while marshal Wade detached a body of horse to second the duke's operations, under the command of general Oglethorpe. The royal army attacked the rear of the rebels at a village called Clifton in Westmoreland, on the eighteenth of December, and made them retire with considerable loss; and on the thirtieth the duke, having driven the rebels into Scotland, retook the city of Carlisle, and sent the garrison to different prisons.

A. D. 1746. The rebels having marched as far as Stirling, one of the most important forts in Scotland, being situated where the High and Lowlands meet, attacked the castle, then commanded by general Blakeney; but they had neither artillery nor engines that could be of service to them in conducting such an enterprise. In the mean time, general Hawley, who had advanced from Edinburgh to Linlithgow, resolved to drive the rebels from Stirling; but on the seventeenth of January both armies met at Falkirk-moor, about six miles south-east from Stirling. There the rebels behaved in the same manner as at Preston-Pans, where general Cope was defeated; for they fell upon the royal army with such fury, that Hawley was obliged to retreat, leaving behind him great part of his baggage and artillery. Indeed there was such a storm of snow, wind and rain, that blew in the faces of the royal army, that many of their muskets would not fire; and the dragoons, of which there were three regiments, fled at the first onset, and breaking through the first line of the foot, threw the whole into the utmost confusion.

However trifling the success obtained by the rebels was, yet it gave them fresh spirits, and because the city of Glasgow had raised a regiment of militia to oppose them, they sent a party under the command of the earl of Kilmarnock, and fined the inhabitants thirty thousand pounds. News of what they called a victory, was sent over to France, and published in the Paris gazette; but the duke of Cumberland, who had returned from Carlisle to London, in consequence of giving his opinion in the privy-council, was sent down to Scotland to take upon him the command of the army, consisting of fourteen battalions, and two regiments of dragoons; besides about five hundred loyal Highlanders, who had been raised in Argyleshire, by colonel John Campbell.

When the duke arrived at Edinburgh he found the army in much better order than he expected; and on the last day of January he began his march towards Stirling; but the rebels retreated at his approach. They were divided in their councils, dispirited because the French had not assisted them according to their expectations, and knowing that the royal army would be too powerful for them, they resolved to retire to the Highlands, imagining that there they might recruit their forces, and make a fresh stand. From Stirling they continued their march to the north, in the most precipitate and irregular manner; but some small advantages obtained by them over several detached parties, inspired them with fresh courage, and enabled them to hope that it was still possible for them to repair their loss.

The duke of Cumberland marched after them with as much expedition as the season would permit; and on the first of April he arrived at Aberdeen, where he was informed that they had seized a sloop in the harbour of Montrose, and sent her to France for fresh supplies.

At Aberdeen he was obliged to remain till such time as the river Spey was fordable, because in that season it overflows its banks; but on the eighth of April he began his march, and crossed that river on the twelfth without any opposition from the rebels, who might have obstructed their passage had they not been reduced to a state of infatuation. In the mean time, the earl of Cromartie, who had been sent into Caithness to raise recruits for the rebel army, was attacked by a party of militia, and both he and his son made prisoners.

At Nairn the duke received intelligence that the rebels had advanced to Culloden near Inverness, and therefore he marched with the utmost expedition. On the morning of the sixteenth, the royal army, having struck their tents, came up with the rebels about noon; but their numbers had been very much lessened in consequence of desertion, sickness, and a variety of other events, so that it was in a manner impossible for them to oppose the duke with any probability of success. About one o'clock both armies were drawn up in order of battle; and the rebels, in their usual manner, attacked the duke's forces with the utmost fury; but fury or the most undaunted courage, is of little service when opposed by troops regularly disciplined.

The royal army had been drawn up with so much order and regularity, that the rebels soon gave way, and within the compass of forty minutes, twelve hundred of them were killed. The dragoons, who flanked the infantry, advanced even to the rear of the rebel army, and meeting in the center, nothing was to be seen but confusion and bloodshed. The remainder of the rebels fled in great disorder; but the duke of Kingston's light horse being ordered to pursue them, a dreadful carnage ensued; for all those who offered to surrender prisoners, were put to the sword; an act of cruelty that would stand unjustified, were it not for the beneficial consequences that flowed from it. Indeed the state of public affairs rendered it in a manner absolutely necessary to make use of the most violent methods, in order to impress the minds of the people with a reverential respect to the government, without which no sort of subordination among the different ranks in society could be maintained.

For some time the duke remained with the army in the Highlands till the public peace was restored, and then he set out for London, where he was received by his royal father with all the marks of parental respect, and by the people with the greatest acclamations of joy. The unfortunate adventurer, who had involved so many families in ruin, wandered about in disguise, subjected to all the miseries arising from hunger and nakedness, till the month of August following, when he got on board a French ship, and was landed at Rescourt, near Morlaix, on the coast of Britany.

Such was the end of this unnatural rebellion, carried on by some discontented persons in favour of a popish pretender; and some noblemen and gentlemen being concerned in it, it was necessary that their lives should atone for their crimes. Accordingly, some of them were attainted, among whom were the lords Kilmarnock and Balmerino; but Cromarty had interest enough to procure a pardon, under certain restrictions. Some others of lesser note suffered; and in the beginning of the following year, lord Lovat, the life and soul of the rebellion, was beheaded on Tower-hill.

During the remainder of this year, the war raged with great fury on the continent: for although an emperor had been chosen, yet the acquisition made by the French in the Netherlands alarmed all Germany, while the Dutch looked for nothing less than immediate destruction. The Dutch in general considered it necessary, that a person should be made choice of to conduct the affairs of the republic, and none seemed more proper than the prince of Orange, who had married the princess royal of England. But a strong party opposed that motion, and the command of the army was a second time conferred on prince Waldeck, a German, and a man of known courage; but as he was not a native of the country, so it could not be supposed that he would act like one naturally attached to the republic.

Early in the spring, the French king took the field, accompanied by marshal Saxe and several other generals: and the allies, under count Bathiani, not being able to oppose them, retreated to Breda, the capital city of Dutch Brabant, leaving Antwerp exposed to the enemy, who, in a few days, took possession of it. A detachment from the French army, under the command of the prince of Conti, was sent to invest Mons, a city of great strength; but the garrison behaved with so much bravery, that notwithstanding the superior numbers of the French, yet the place held out till the latter end of July, when they were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. So rapid were the French conquests after the battle of Fontenoy, that every place gave way to them almost as soon as they approached; and Lewis XV. published an edict, whereby he ordered to be annexed to his dominions all those provinces that had been taken from his kingdom by the treaty of Utrecht. All the towns of strength in the Austrian Netherlands had submitted to the French, except Namur, a strong fort situated on the confluence of the Maese and the Sambre; and that the French resolved to bring under subjection as soon as the season of the year would permit.

On the eighteenth of July, the allied army being reinforced with the Hessians that had been sent over to Scotland, and also with a strong body of Austrians, resolved to remain no longer unconcerned spectators, but to oppose the French with courage and perseverance. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had marched towards the Netherlands, knew the importance of Namur, and therefore he drew up the allied army, which he had now taken under his command, on an eminence in sight of the French forces.

Nothing could have been better contrived than the measures taken by prince Charles, so far as he was able to act consistent with the inferiority of his army to that of the enemy. But the count Lowendahl having taken Huy, where the allies had their magazine, the prince was obliged to retire to the north of the Maese, and leave Namur exposed to the enemy. Accordingly, the trenches before it were opened on the second of September, and the siege carried on by thirty-five thousand French till the twenty-third, when the garrison, consisting of four thousand Austrians, after making a brave defence, were obliged to surrender prisoners of war. The allied army, which lay encamped near Maestricht, being joined by Sir John Ligonier, with several battalions from Britain, prince Charles resolved not to remain any longer inactive, but to venture on an engagement with the French; but count Saxe perceived his intention, and having fortified his camp in the strongest manner, the allied army was obliged to return once more to Maestricht. To that place they were followed by the French, who had been reinforced with that part of the army which had been employed against Namur. The allies now finding that an engagement was inevitable, prepared to meet the enemy, who had been drawn up in three columns, with artillery in the front; and about noon a most dreadful cannonading began, which did great execution on both sides. At last the allies, after having done every thing that could have been performed by brave men, were obliged to abandon the field, and retreat to Maestricht: but the French purchased the victory extremely dear, without being able to reap any material advantages from it.

In Italy, the Austrian and Sardinian forces performed many signal actions. Don Philip was obliged to abandon Milan; and the king of Sardinia having retaken all the Piedmontese forts, advanced towards Genoa, in order to join the Austrian army. This brought on a most bloody engagement, in which above nine thousand of the French and Spaniards were killed, and six thousand taken prisoners; while the Austrians did not lose above four thousand. Soon after this battle, the Austrian forces were joined by those of the king of Sardinia, who took upon him the command in chief, and resolved, if possible, to drive the French and Spaniards from their entrenchments, which he effected; for they were obliged to retreat, with the loss of eight thousand men, besides their cannon and ammunition.

Don Philip, in consequence of these repeated losses, found his army reduced to thirty thousand men, with which he returned to Provence, and put them into winter quarters. Nor was it much better with the count de Gages, whose forces suffered considerably; and the court of Madrid was so enraged, that he was recalled, and the command given to the marquis de las Minas.

On the fourth of December, the senate of Genoa delivered up their capital city to the Austrians, who placed in it a garrison of only sixteen hundred men, under the command of the marquis de Botta. Had the Austrians, on this occasion, observed a conduct consistent with humanity, they might have remained masters of Genoa; but their cruelty, in exacting taxes of an exorbitant nature, drove the people to despair, and then awakened in them the last remaining spark of courage. They rose in such numbers upon the garrison, that they killed many of them; and being joined by the peasants in the neighbouring country, the whole Austrian army was driven out of the territories of Genoa.

In the latter end of this year, died Philip, king of Spain, a man of a peaceable disposition, but hurried on to war by the intrigues of the French king, and the ambition of his queen, who was a mortal enemy to the Austrian family. Much about the same time, died Christian VI. king of Denmark, a prince beloved by his subjects; and was succeeded by his son Frederick, who had married the princess Louisa, daughter of his Britannic majesty, and who reigned many years afterwards, rather as a tender parent than an absolute sovereign.

With respect to naval affairs during this year, little was done to promote the interest of Great-Britain. In the East-Indies were six ships of the line, which prevented the French from seizing on our settlements: but in America nothing of importance happened. An attempt was made by an English squadron, of sixteen ships of the line, under the command of admiral Lestock, and eight battalions of land-forces, commanded by general Sinclair, to take possession of Port l'Orient, on the coast of Britany; but they were driven back by the French, who had notice of their intentions.

On the eighteenth of November, the parliament met; and his majesty, in his speech, told them, that it had been proposed to hold a conference at Breda; but as it could not be known what would be the issue, he was determined to prosecute the war with vigour; and therefore the commons were given to understand, that it would be necessary for them to grant the supplies as soon as possible. Both houses were unanimous in presenting the most loyal and affectionate addresses to his majesty; and the commons granted him nine millions, four hundred and twenty-five thousand, two hundred and fifty-four thousand pounds, for defraying the expences of the war. On the other hand, the king, in order to ingratiate himself with the people, proposed to reduce three regiments of horse to dragoons, and two troops of his life-guards, by which a considerable sum of money would be saved; and so sensible were the commons of the king's œconomy in reducing these unnecessary forces, that they received his message with the warmest expressions of gratitude, and both houses presented him with addresses on the occasion.

In the mean time, it appeared evident that the French had no intentions of making peace; for their late successes had made them so arrogant, that they would hearken to no terms of accommodation, but such as should be dictated by themselves. Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, who had succeeded his father, began to wish for peace; and even went so far, as to upbraid the French ministry with having led his subjects into an expensive and unnecessary war. The king of Portugal was made choice of to act as a mediator between Great-Britain and Spain; but the negotiation was rendered abortive, by the artful intrigues of the French, and the unrelenting disposition of the Spanish queen-dowager. Such was the state of public affairs at the end of this year. In Italy, the Austrians had been successful, but their provinces in the Netherlands were in the hands of the French. The allies could only act on the defensive, while Holland was every moment in danger of being totally subdued.

A. D. 1747. The French resolved, early in the beginning of this year, to make the most powerful efforts; and, for that purpose, Lewis XV. proposed opening the campaign at the head of an army consisting of one hundred and fifty thousand men; while sixty thousand were sent into Provence, to assist the Spaniards, and enable them once more to distress the Austrians and the king of Sardinia.

The duke of Cumberland having restored peace at home, by subduing the rebels, went over to Flanders, and in the month of February marched the allied army, in three divisions, to the banks of the Maese, amounting in the whole to one hundred and twenty-six thousand men. Marshal Saxe, whose army lay in quarters of cantonment along the Schelde, from Brussels to Antwerp, formed a resolution of making himself master of Holland: and having transmitted an account of his design to the French court, it was approved of by a great majority, and orders were sent him to begin the operations as soon as the season would permit. Accordingly count Lowendahl attacked Sluys with an army of twenty-seven thousand men, and in a few days the garrison was obliged to surrender. Many other places surrendered almost as soon as attacked; for the Dutch, during the greatest part of this war, behaved in the most cowardly and infamous manner. Hulst, in particular, a place of great importance, was surrendered up by the Dutch governor, although he knew that the duke of Cumberland was within a day's march to assist him. In a few weeks, count Lowendahl subdued every place in Dutch Flanders; upon which the people of Holland rose in a most tumultuous manner, and insisted that the prince of Orange should be made choice of as stadtholder, and intrusted with the executive authority. It was in vain to oppose the popular clamour; and the states of Zealand having made choice of the prince to be their captain-general and admiral, their example was followed by the rest of the provinces, which gave the utmost satisfaction to the people.

Things now began to wear a different aspect; for a treaty had been concluded between Great-Britain and the empress of Russia, by which the latter was to furnish fifty thousand men, to act in such manner as his Britannic majesty should think proper. The Dutch, who had hitherto acted in the most dilatory manner, promised to exert themselves, on condition that the British parliament should be dissolved; a proposal which his majesty complied with, although they had not sat six years. Accordingly, on the eighteenth of June, his majesty went to the house of peers, and the commons being present, he told them, that although he found himself under the necessity of dissolving them, yet it was not from any motives of disgust, but to comply with the requests of his allies. He thanked them for the generous manner in which they had contributed towards the expence of the war; and then the parliament was dissolved, after having passed the famous act for abolishing hereditary jurisdictions in Scotland, which, in all probability, will prevent a rebellion from ever breaking out again in that part of the kingdom.

The duke of Cumberland, who had been obliged to remain some time inactive, drew in his scattered parties on the twentieth of July, and formed, for an engagement with the French, at a village called Vall, or La Vall, near the town of Maestricht. The French were strongly posted on the rising ground, in sight of the allies, and both armies continued to cannonade each other till the evening. Next morning, by day-break, marshal Saxe ordered the French infantry to march down upon the allies, which they did in a vast column of ten battalions in front, and as many in depth, and attacked the village of La Vall with amazing fury. This was one of the boldest attempts that could have been made; for the allies had planted batteries of cannon in all the avenues leading to the village, which did prodigious execution among the enemy, and the village was four times taken and retaken. At last numbers prevailed, and the allies were obliged to give up the village.

In the mean time, the duke of Cumberland ordered the British and Hanoverian forces to advance on the right of the enemy; and he had taken his measures so prudently, that victory would have declared in favour of the allies, had it not been for the cowardly behaviour of the Dutch. The British and Hanoverian foot advanced with such bravery, that the French had almost given way, and the duke ordered the Dutch cavalry to support them; but, instead of obeying the orders, they wheeled to the right, and trod down five battalions of the allied army. The French general, taking the advantage of this unexpected circumstance, ordered his cavalry to advance, which they did, and broke through the lines of the English. In vain did the duke of Cumberland attempt to rally the Dutch forces; and had it not been for the most exemplary behaviour and bravery of Sir John Ligonier, the allied army would have been totally defeated. That brave general, putting himself at the head of a large body of cavalry, attacked the French with such fury, that he checked their progress, and, in consequence thereof, enabled the duke to retreat in very good order. Sir John having, by his gallant behaviour, thus saved the army, was the last man that offered to retreat, and then he was taken prisoner, along with the Hanoverian general d'Ysembourg, general Bland, colonel Conway, and lord Robert Sutton. The loss, in killed and wounded, fell almost wholly on the English, Hanoverians and Hessians, for few of the Austrians engaged; and the Dutch, instead of having done their duty, contributed, in a great measure, towards the loss of the battle. This victory cost the French ten thousand of their best troops; nor was it attended with any great advantages;

tages, for the duke ordered the garrison of Maastricht to be reinforced with several battalions, and established his head quarters at Heer in the dutchy of Limberg.

The country laying open before them, the French resolved to attack Bergen-op-zoom, the strongest fort belonging to the Dutch, and situated in such a manner that it could not be blocked up by sea. It had been hitherto considered as impregnable; for altho' often besieged by great armies, yet had never been taken. The command of the siege was given to the count Lowendahl, one of the greatest generals in Europe; while the fortress, one of the most important that the Dutch had to lose, was left to the care of baron Cronstram, an old superannuated general, destitute of courage, and utterly unacquainted with the art of war. It was imagined by most people, that the French would never be able to take the place; but the activity of count Lowendahl overcame every difficulty; and after two months siege a breach was made; and the French battalions entered the place; while the old governor, who ought to have been every where to superintend the works, was sleeping in his quarters.

The whole of the garrison would have been made prisoners of war, had it not been for the bravery of a regiment of Scotch highlanders, under the command of lord John Murray, who fought like lions, and three-fourths of them were left dead on the spot. The French king created count Lowendahl a marshal of France, the highest dignity he could raise him to; and Bergen-op-zoom being in the power of the enemy, the two armies went into winter quarters, while the duke of Cumberland returned to London.

With respect to the affairs of Italy, the war was carried on there with great vigour. The marshal de Bellisle, who had been released from imprisonment, was sent to command the French army in Provence; but notwithstanding he attempted to penetrate into Piedmontese, yet he met with such opposition from the count de Briqueras, that after an engagement that lasted near a whole day, the French were obliged to retreat, with the loss of near five thousand men.

Money, with arms and ammunition, had been remitted to the republic of Genoa from the French, so that they had been enabled to defend their own territories; but Lewis XV. who had been so successful in Flanders, saw all his Italian projects baffled, and his forces obliged to return to Provence.

With respect to naval affairs, they were very favourable to Britain during this year; for the French, having ordered a fleet to be fitted out in order to recover Cape Breton, the English admirals, Anson and Warren, were sent to oppose them with a strong fleet of ships of the line. Accordingly on the third of May, a most bloody engagement happened near Cape Finisterre, in which the French were defeated with considerable loss, and all their designs of relieving their colonies were rendered abortive. Mr. Anson and Mr. Warren, upon their return home, were both rewarded with marks of the royal favour; the first being created a peer of England, and the other with a red ribbon of the Bath.

Captain Fox, who commanded the Kent, fell in with a fleet of French merchantmen from St. Dominica, near the coast of Galicia, and took twenty-six of them richly laden; by which our brave seamen were, in part, rewarded handsomely for the hardships they had suffered. But this was not all the loss that the French suffered at sea; for, towards the latter end of October, admiral Hawke was dispatched to intercept their West India fleet, and fell in with them near Bellisle. A most desperate engagement ensued, in which the French were utterly defeated; and six ships, with three thousand prisoners were brought into the harbour of Portsmouth. All these losses tended towards discouraging the French; for although their conquests in the Netherlands had been very rapid, yet their nation was drained both of men and money; while their commerce was destroyed, and their subjects starving: from which circumstance we may learn, the importance a good navy is of to Britain.

With respect to the queen of Hungary, the king of Spain, and others of the allies, they were all heartily tired of the war; and Britain, though at more expence than all the others put together, seemed resolved not to sheath the sword till justice was done; that peace might be concluded upon honourable and advantageous terms. The French king had intimated to Sir John Ligonier, that he was desirous of peace; and, in consequence thereof, towards the latter end of this year, friendly messages passed between all the contending parties.

The election for members to serve in the new parliament had been carried on every where in favour of the court, and both houses met on the tenth of November, when his majesty took notice of the happiness that would arise to the protestant interest, by the change of government that had taken place in the United Provinces; and he congratulated them on the vast success of the British navy, by which it was probable peace would soon be established.

The first thing done by the ministry, was to bring in a bill for the general naturalization of foreign protestants; but the city of London remonstrated so strongly against it, that it was thought most prudent to drop the bill.

A. D. 1748. The committee of ways and means proposed giving nine millions for the expences of the year; and it being approved of by the commons, was unanimously granted, partly by a land-tax, and partly by a loan on the credit of the exchequer. In March a congress was opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinson on the part of the English; count de St. Severin for the French; and for the states-general baron de Wafsenae and mynheer Hasselaer. On the thirteenth of May the king prorogued the parliament, after having informed them, that preliminaries for a general peace had been signed, and then set out for Holland, where he had a conference with the prince of Orange before he proceeded to Hanover.

On the third day of May, marshal Saxe entered the town of Maastricht, which had been surrendered upon condition, that it should be delivered up without any damage being done to the stores and magazines, if a cessation of arms then took place, in order to make room for a general pacification. To the deputies already mentioned were added the following, viz: the marquis de la Porthune Thuill, on the part of France; for Spain the marquis de Soto Major; for the house of Austria, count de Raunitz; for the king of Sardinia, Don Joseph Offorio, and the count de Chavennes; for the republic of Genoa, the marquis Dorio; count de Monzone; for the duke of Modena; and for the Dutch, the count Bentinck. During the conferences between these plenipotentiaries, many difficulties were started that could not be adjusted till the return of expresses from their different sovereigns; and, after several months spent in daily conferences, peace was concluded upon terms to the following purport:

On the seventh day of October all prisoners, who had been taken during the war, were to be released, and the conquests returned to their former owners. Don Philip was to have Parma and Placentia in Italy; but if he should either assume the throne of Spain or Naples, or die without male issue, these provinces were to be given up to the house of Austria. Great Britain was to send two persons of high rank as hostages to remain in Paris, till such places had been given up as had been conquered by us from the French; and accordingly the earl of Suffolk and lord Cathcart were sent; but this measure gave great displeasure to the people in general, because they looked upon it as dishonourable; and to all intents and purposes a disgrace to the nation. Dunkirk was to remain fortified on the land side, but all the works adjoining to the sea were to be destroyed, and the harbour laid laid open. The king of Prussia was to enjoy peaceable possession of the province of Silesia, and the queen of Hungary was to remain sovereign of all the hereditary dominions left her by her father the emperor Charles VI. and which had for many years belonged to her family.

The Spaniards were to have leave, for four years, to purchase slaves on the coast of Guinea; a privilege that they had been long deprived of: and with respect to the other parts and articles of this treaty, they were rather of a formal than an important nature.

Such were the principal parts of this treaty, and few are to be met with in history that ever gave greater offence to the people in general. Great sums of money had been granted by the British parliament, the subjects had been loaded with heavy taxes, and they had paid them in order to support the honour of the nation; but here, in consequence of this treaty, they found that their treasure had been lavished away, and the flower of their army destroyed, for no other purpose than that of supporting German princes, and protecting the electorate of Hanover. They complained that their plenipotentiaries had deceived them, and concluded the articles of peace before they had been duly considered by the people; and nothing but murmurs were to be heard from the one end of the kingdom to the other.

His Britannic majesty, who had been, during the summer, on a visit to his electoral dominions, where he established the famous university of Gottingen, returned to England in the latter end of October; and on the twenty-ninth of November both houses of parliament met at Westminster. His majesty, in his speech, informed them, that he had taken the most effectual methods to promote the interest of his people, consistent with the state of public affairs; and that as most of the contending parties seemed averse to carrying on the war any longer, so he doubted not but peace would now be established on the most solid and lasting foundation. He added, that now the war was over, the public expence would be much lessened; and therefore, all he desired of them was, that they would grant such supplies as should, from a proper estimate, appear necessary to support the dignity of the crown, by enabling him to fulfil those engagements, which, in consequence of the late treaty of peace he had entered into.

In answer to this speech both houses presented very loyal and affectionate addresses, though not without some opposition from the commons. Some of the members in the opposition condemned the conduct of the ministry in giving plenary powers to the deputies to conclude a peace before the arrival of thirty-seven thousand Russians, who were on their march to join the allied army. They insisted, that an enquiry should be set on foot to make those at the helm of public affairs, give an account in what manner the public money had been so lavishly squandered away; but the power of the ministerial party bore down all opposition.

The conduct of Mr. Pelham, brother to the duke of Newcastle, was severely censured; but Mr. Pitt, since earl of Chatham, and Mr. Murray, now lord Mansfield, spoke so forcibly in his favour, that eight millions were granted for the service of the current year; a most amazing sum, when we consider that the war was over; but a proof of the intense riches of the nation, and the obligations that British sovereigns are under, to live on good terms with their subjects.

From the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle to the death of George II.

A. D. 1749. IN consequence of the late treaty, the French were put in peaceable possession of Cape Breton; and the ministry resolved to cultivate the province of Nova Scotia, in the northern part of America. This scheme was chiefly promoted and encouraged by the earl of Halifax, first lord of trade and plantations; and his majesty, ever attentive to the welfare of his subjects, countenanced it with his royal approbation. Accordingly, many artificers and husbandmen were sent thither in order to clear the grounds, and make way for a proper settlement; and it must be acknowledged that the British nation left nothing undone in order to promote so patriotic a scheme. A town was built by the mere force of industry, which is now a flourishing port, and named Halifax, from the title of the peer, who first projected it. Many people have settled in its neighbourhood, and, upon the whole, it may be looked upon as one of the most valuable acquisitions to Great Britain.

The remainder of the transactions during this year, were not of a very important nature. Some domestic disturbances happened in consequence of the late peace; for many of the foldiers and seamen having been discharged, and not knowing in what manner to procure a subsistence, committed street robberies, for which many of them were executed.

The parliament met on the sixteenth of November, and the king, in his speech to both houses, informed them, that it was with the utmost pleasure he could now behold peace in Europe, by which the public credit was again re-established, and commerce, the support of the nation, was likely to flourish. To this speech both houses returned the most loyal and affectionate addresses, after which they entered upon public business, and granted his majesty such a supply, as was able to defray all the expences of government. Some of the students of Oxford having been guilty of uttering expressions of a treasonable nature, were tried in the court of King's bench, and two of them were obliged to walk with papers on their breasts through Westminster-hall.

A. D. 1750. One thing of great importance that engaged the attention of this parliament was the herring fishery; and a bill being brought in for that purpose, it passed into a law, and a society was formed for carrying it into execution, at the head of which was his royal highness Frederick, prince of Wales. Another act passed this session for encouragement of Weavers in the sail-cloth trade, an article of the utmost importance to the British nation. Upon the whole, few sessions ever passed more acts for the general encouragement of commerce and manufactures; but indeed nothing could be more necessary, as the nation had been almost ruined by an expensive and destructive war.

On the twelfth of April the king went, in the usual manner, to the house of peers, where, in a speech from the throne, he thanked the commons for that attention which they had paid to the interests of the the nation, and for the supplies granted to support the government.

Some things of a domestic nature took place this year, which must not be passed over in silence. On the eighth of February, a shock of an earthquake was felt in London, by which some chimnies were thrown down, and the Thames was very much agitated. The consternation of the people on this occasion is even beyond description. But what was still more, on the eighth of March, about half past five in the morning, such a violent shock was felt, that many of the people ran from their beds naked, being afraid that their houses would tumble upon them. This shock was not confined to London, for it was felt in some other parts, particularly in Essex, Kent, and Surrey: and a wild enthusiastic, driven mad by zeal, foretold, that on the eighth of April, a third shock of an earthquake would lay all London in ruins. One would have thought that such a prediction would have been treated with the utmost contempt; especially, as it is declared in Holy writ, that such things are known to God only; but notwithstanding, so infatuated were thousands of people, that they actually believed the impostor, and waited for the accomplishment of his prediction, as if he had been a messenger sent from heaven.

The goal distemper, which, in its consequences, generally proves as fatal as the plague, broke out during the session at the Old Bailey, in the month of April this year. Sir Samuel Pennant, lord-mayor of London, Sir Daniel Lambert, one of the aldermen, Sir Thomas Abney, one of the judges of the court of Common-Pleas, baron Clarke of the exchequer, seven gentlemen of the law, several of the jury, besides a great number of those who were present to hear the trials lost their lives. Indeed it cannot be ascertained how many persons died; but certain it is, that the city was greatly alarmed, and every one was afraid of the infection.

During the summer of this year his majesty went to visit his electoral dominions, and during his residence there, he signed a treaty with the emperor of Morocco; by which, all the British captives in his dominions were set at liberty. Few other things worth notice happened this year either at home or abroad; for the people were enjoying the sweets of peace after the toils of war.

The prince and princess of Wales, with their eldest daughter the princess Augusta, during this summer, went on a tour to the west and south of England; where they were received, and treated with that respect due to their high station and amiable characters.

While his majesty was abroad, he endeavoured to get the archduke Joseph, son of the emperor, elected king of the Romans; but the scheme met with such opposition, that for the present it was obliged to be laid aside.

A. D. 1751. On the seventeenth of January, the parliament met, and the king, in his speech, informed them, that he had concluded two treaties, one with the king of Spain, and the other with some of the German princes, the contents of which should be laid before them. He recommended to both houses unanimity in their councils: and concluded, by desiring them not to forget the state of the nation, but above all things provide for its internal safety. To this speech loyal addresses were presented by both houses, and received by his majesty in the most gracious manner.

The first thing that engaged the attention of the commons, was a violent dispute between lord Trentham, and Sir George Vandeput, relating to a seat in parliament. Lord Trentham having accepted the place of a lord of the admiralty, his seat became vacant, and a writ was issued for the election of a new member to represent the city of Westminster.

Lord Trentham was supported by the ministry, who looked upon Sir George Vandeput as one set up by the popular party. A poll being demanded and taken, the high-bailiff declared the majority to be in favour of lord Trentham; but that not being satisfactory to the opposite party, they proceeded to a scrutiny. Still the majority seemed to be in favour of lord Trentham, and the high-bailiff returned him duly elected; upon which he took the oaths and his seat in the house. At this measure, the friends of Sir George were so much enraged, that they presented a petition to the house, complaining of the conduct of the high-bailiff; to which lord Trentham presented an answer; setting forth, that the friends of Sir George had, in the whole of their conduct, acted utterly inconsistent with the constitution, and instead of supporting the freedom of election, had intimidated all those who came to poll; unless they happened to be of their own party; and that they had gone so far as to threaten the high-bailiff.

That a proper enquiry might be made into these allegations, the high-bailiff was summoned to the bar of the house, where he gave information, that the honourable Mr. Murray, brother to the lord Elibank, Mr. Crowle, a counsellor at law, and one Gibson, an upholster, had obstructed him in the discharge of his duty. Crowle was obliged to kneel down at the bar of the house, and receive a reprimand on his knees from the speaker; and Gibson was committed to Newgate. With respect to Mr. Murray, the charge against him was very heavy; for it appeared, from undoubted evidence, that he had raised a most outrageous mob, and called out to them to knock the dog on the head; by which he meant the high-bailiff.

Accordingly he was committed a close prisoner to Newgate, and then brought to the bar of the house to receive judgment; but when he came, he refused to kneel; at which the house was so much enraged, that he was recommitted to the same prison, and forbid the use of pens, ink, or paper, nor was any one permitted to converse with him, unless they first received an order from the speaker. In that manner he remained in prison till the end of the session, and the power of parliament being then dissolved, he was set at liberty amidst the acclamations of the people.

During this session of parliament his royal highness Frederick, prince of Wales, was seized with a fever, which put an end to his valuable life, on the twentieth day of March, in the forty-fifth year of his age. His royal highness left, besides his present majesty, four sons and three daughters, and soon after his death was born the princess Carolina Matilda, now queen of Denmark. The day after the prince's death his body was opened, and it was found that there was an abscess upon his lungs, which had burst and occasioned his death. His remains were deposited in the chapel of Henry VII. the duke of Somerset walking as chief mourner, attended by several other noblemen.

With respect to the character of this prince, we must consider it both in a public and private light. In public, he seemed to have nothing so much at heart as the good of the people; and he often attended the debates in the house of peers, in order to acquire a perfect knowledge of the constitution. The people in general had formed the most sanguine hopes, that one day they would be happy under his government; and there is great reason to believe, that had he ascended the throne, he would have cultivated the arts of peace in a manner superior to all those who had gone before him. In his private life, he was an affectionate husband, a tender parent, an indulgent master, and a sincere friend. All the time he could spare from public business, was spent in superintending the education of his children; so that it may justly be said of him, "He joined in one, the prince, the father, the husband, and the friend." But all the hopes of the public were blasted, and sunk in the nature of all sublunary things.

The death of the prince, for some time, put an end to party disputes, and his eldest son, our present sovereign, was created prince of Wales; while the princely-dowager of Wales, his mother, was to act as regent in his stead, if his majesty should happen to die before he arrived at years of maturity.

On the twenty-second day of May, his majesty went to the house of peers, and gave his royal assent to the bill for abolishing the old, and establishing the new stile; which has been attended with the most beneficial consequences to the merchants in general, who, before that time, were often led into confusion concerning the dates of their bills and letters. On the twenty-fifth of June, his majesty prorogued the parliament; and, in his speech, informed them, that as a general dissoluteness of manners had taken place among the people, it was their duty to do all in their power to enforce the execution of those laws which had been made against immorality and profaneness.

On the eleventh of October, this year, the prince of Orange died, in the forty-first year of his age; and that event was succeeded by the death of the queen of Denmark, youngest daughter of his majesty, who expired on the nineteenth of December.

With respect to the affairs on the continent, the French seemed intent on prosecuting their design of enlarging their conquests in North-America, and in spurring up the Indians to murder our traders on the borders of Virginia. Spain was intent on putting their navy on a proper footing; and, for that purpose, several of the men who, in consequence of the peace, had been discharged from our dock-yards, were inveigled over to that country, where they built several ships of war, on the same model as the English. Nothing could be more inconsistent with sound policy, than to suffer those useful men to leave the kingdom; and it was the duty of the ministry, when they discharged them, to provide for them some other employments, instead of leaving them to starve.

On the fourteenth day of November, the parliament met; and the king, in a speech from the throne, informed them, that he had concluded a treaty with the king of Poland, who was now become his most faithful ally; and that, with respect to the death of the prince of Orange, it would make no alteration in the state of public affairs. He told them, that the states-general were firm in the interest of Great-Britain: and concluded by recommending to their notice the shocking condition in which the nation was involved by a spirit of licentiousness that seemed to have diffused itself through all ranks of people; so that nothing but the grossest immorality and profaneness were to be met with. Both houses presented loyal and affectionate addresses to his majesty; and Mr. Muncy, who had given so much disturbance during the former sessions, made his escape out of the kingdom; while the publisher of a pamphlet, intitled his case, was prosecuted at common law, and, after a long hearing, was most honourably acquitted by the jury.

A.D. 1752. The commons having granted the necessary supplies, amounting in the whole to four millions, other business of a very important nature was entered upon, and many useful acts passed for the regulation of the internal policy of the nation. One act was made to punish such as kept disorderly houses; and another, by which all pawnbrokers were obliged to take out licences: that the people in the highlands might be brought under a proper subjection to the government, some of the forfeited estates were reduced into one consolidated fund, and the profits arising from them appropriated towards erecting charity-schools, that the children of those concerned in the rebellion might be brought up in the principles of the protestant religion. Working-schools were at the same time established, by which many poor children were usefully employed; and posterity will have reason to bless those who first proposed making an act that will, in the end, be attended with the most beneficial consequences.

Another act passed during this session of parliament, for preventing the horrid crime of murder:

wherein it was ordained, that every criminal convicted of having wilfully, and of malice, killed another, should be executed on the next day except one after the sentence was pronounced: but if it should happen that judgment was pronounced on Friday, then execution was not to take place till Monday, because of the Sunday intervening. The body of the malefactor was to be either delivered to the surgeons, to be dissected and anatomized, or it was to be hung in chains on a gibbet; but it was not, on any account whatever, to be buried. The commons passed a resolution, that, for the future, all their daily journals should be annually published, and the care of the publication was left to Mr. Hardinge, the chief clerk, which gave great satisfaction to the subjects in general: and on the twenty-sixth day of March, the king went to Westminster, and prorogued both houses of parliament.

Most of the powers of Europe were, during this year, very busy in promoting such schemes as seemed consistent either with their interest or ambition. Some trifling disputes arose between the king of Prussia and the court of Great-Britain, but these were adjusted in the most amicable manner. In Corsica, nothing was to be seen, but disorders of the worst sort; for the Genoese, who pretended to the right of sovereignty over that island, had imposed such grievous taxes on the people, that they became mad by oppression. In Germany, a second attempt was made to elect the archduke Joseph king of the Romans; but it was so violently opposed by the king of Prussia, that the whole dropped for the present, contrary to the inclination of his Britannic majesty, who had exerted himself very much on the occasion. In America, the French were carrying on their plots in such a barefaced manner, that it was not consistent with the honour or interest of Britain to remain an idle spectator. Nor were the French less assiduous in executing their projects in the East-Indies, where they spurred up the natives to make incursions into our settlements, by which many of our traders were much injured. In the West-Indies, the same schemes were carried on; so that the people of this country began to see that the French had only made peace in order to declare war as soon as they could, consistent with the nature of their circumstances.

On the fifteenth of September this year, a most dreadful hurricane happened in South-Carolina, by which many of the inhabitants were killed, and several houses in Charles-Town destroyed. This reduced the people to great distress; but the generosity of the inhabitants of Great-Britain was so warm in their favour, that all their losses were made up, and the colony left in a more flourishing condition than ever. Nothing more of any importance happened this year; for, during the greatest part of the summer, his Britannic majesty had been at Hanover.

A.D. 1753. The public business during this year was, for the most part, of a parliamentary nature. The sessions was opened on the eleventh of January, and both houses presented very loyal addresses to his majesty. Two millions were granted for the service of the current year; and, upon the most strict enquiry, it appeared that the national debt amounted to the enormous sum of seventy-four millions, three hundred and sixty-eight thousand, four hundred and fifty-one pounds fifteen shillings. Several excellent acts passed during this session, particularly one for bringing to justice all those concerned in plundering such ships as should happen, by stress of weather, to be driven on the English coast. The inhabitants residing near the sea, particularly in Cornwall, had been long guilty of that infamous practice; and those who ought to have been considered as objects of compassion, were robbed, and stripped naked.

But that which principally attracted the notice both of the public and the legislature, was a bill brought in for the general naturalization of the Jews. It was much countenanced by the ministry, and all the towns where manufactures are carried on in an extensive extensive manner: and having originated in the house of lords, it passed with very little opposition. No sooner was it known that the bill had passed the upper house, than the nation seemed in one continued scene of clamour and opposition. It was represented as an attempt to undermine the christian religion, and set aside the order of God. The lord-mayor of London, with the aldermen and common-council, presented petitions against it, and so did the merchants; but notwithstanding, it passed the lower house by a great majority. It is not consistent with the dignity of history to intermeddle with political disputes any farther than to relate the circumstances that gave rise to them. Those who supported this bill thought that great riches would be brought into the nation; and that the Jews, by buying up the goods manufactured by our artificers, would extend our commerce throughout the world. On the other hand, the popular party said, that the Jews had been fugitives and vagabonds ever since the reign of the emperor Vespasian; that it was the order of God they should be so for rejecting the Messiah, and the terms of salvation offered in the gospel. They added farther, that they were to continue so till they acknowledged the Lord of glory, and therefore it was the highest presumption in us to grant them any indulgence. Indeed, the legislative power, as well as the ministry, were sensible of this; for next session the act was repealed, and the people, in consequence thereof, looked upon themselves as released from a state of bondage.

The next bill in which the whole nation looked upon itself as concerned, was that to prevent clandestine marriages. It is certain, that every man and woman, at a proper age, have a right to enter into the marriage state, consistent with their own inclinations: but in all civil societies, it has been found necessary to lay such restrictions on this institution, as may prevent its being abused. Thus, it is natural to suppose, that every man who enters into the marriage state, is not only capable, but also under an obligation, to provide, in a proper manner, consistent with his circumstances, for his wife and children. It is a duty he owes to the community; and therefore those not qualified for such an important trust, will be ready to leave their wives to starve, while the education of their innocent children will be neglected. Marriages, too often contracted in private, and to answer sinister purposes, left no room for a public proof, if any dispute arose concerning them; and many innocent children, in consequence thereof, had been ruined. It may farther be added, that in many societies it is found necessary to make natural rights give way to some political institutions, which may be only of a temporary nature.

On the other hand, it was argued by those who opposed the bill, that all mankind are, by nature, free; and that nothing can constitute a real marriage beyond the consent of the parties: that all agreements, even of the most trifling nature, were founded on consent; and if so, then marriage, the cement and support of human society, ought to rest upon the same principle: that those who did not enter into the marriage state by voluntary consent, could never take that care of their tender and helpless offspring, which, by all the laws of society, was incumbent upon them.

It is necessary to observe, that neither the ministry nor the opposition could be charged with this bill: it did not originate from either in particular, but from a combination of both. In a word, the reason for bringing in the bill was that of young heirs and heiresses having inadvertently placed their affections on others below their station, by which they were often reduced to ruin. It is extremely natural for men who have procured titles, and acquired riches, to endeavour to preserve the one untainted, and the other undiminished; and the warmer passions becoming extinct in the mind, a sort of nominal prudence takes place that can never be agreeable to youth. Such were the reasons assigned, or rather made use of, in framing this bill; and it not only passed both houses by a great majority, but also became a law, in consequence of the royal assent. It is certain, that it has both its advantages and disadvantages, but the end designed by it has not taken place. No provision is made in the act against foreign marriages; and therefore nothing is more common than to hear of minors going over to the continent, to indulge their inclinations; nor has Scotland, where the protestant religion is professed, been so much as mentioned. The act, like all others of a public nature, occasioned much speculation, and was either approved of or condemned according to the different sentiments of the people. It is certain, that it might have been framed in a much better manner; but, upon the whole, we may see that nothing is more difficult than the reducing of natural principles to civil institutions, founded upon the caprice of men who, in general, are guided by their passions, instead of reason.

This year was remarkable for an institution which had been long wanting in Britain, and of the utmost importance to the republic of letters. The vast collection of natural curiosities belonging to Sir Hans Sloane, were purchased by the government, and deposited in the noble structure called Montague House, in Great Russell-street, near Bloomsbury. But, that the honour of the nation might be fully established, and a place opened for men of learning to study, without being at any expence, the collection of manuscripts belonging to the earl of Oxford were likewise purchased; and these, with the king's library, and the valuable collection made by Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton, were brought to the same place, which is now called the British Museum, and is open for the reception and use of the public in general. Nothing could have done greater honour to the nation than this instance of their good sense and unbounded liberality. The most curious records in the nation, and copies of such books as are not to be found any where else, are now left free for the inspection of every one. The great officers of state, amounting to twenty-one in number, are appointed official governors of this royal foundation. Two are appointed by the Oxford family, two by the descendants of Sir Hans Sloane, and the same number by those who are heirs to Sir John and Sir Robert Cotton. These, amounting to twenty-seven in number, are to chuse fifteen more, so as to make the whole body of governors forty-two. But although their number is so large, yet no person can be presented to an office in the house, but by an order signed by the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, and the speaker of the house of commons.

The parliament continued sitting till the seventeenth of June, when his majesty went to the house of peers, and informed them, that nothing had happened, so far as he had been able to procure intelligence, that could in the least disturb the public peace: and then both houses were prorogued.

With respect to foreign affairs, the French were every where busy in preparing to break through the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, as soon as an opportunity should offer. They had been spitting up some of the nabobs, or subordinate princes in the East-Indies, to take up arms against the English; and although many of their attempts had been rendered abortive, yet they did not desist from them; so that at last, as will appear in the sequel, it became a national concern. It was much the same in America, where they had instigated the natives of Canada, and some other provinces, to take up arms against the British settlers in Nova Scotia, in order to reduce that province, which had been established at so much expence, to the condition of a French colony.

On the fifteenth of November, both houses of parliament met; and the king, in his speech, informed them, that he was on the best of terms with his allies: but many of the commons were not satisfied fied with this declaration, so that violent debates arose before an address could be presented. But still the ministry carried their point; and such bills as had passed having received the royal assent, the parliament was dissolved, and writs issued for the election of a new one.

A. D. 1754. During the recess of parliament, Mr. Pelham, brother to the duke of Newcastle, died, and was succeeded in that important office, of first lord of the treasury, by his brother, at that time one of the secretaries of state. He was a man of great abilities, beloved by the people, and honoured by his sovereign with many marks of his royal favour. He was a real friend to the Hanover family; and, during a course of many years, he had supported the interests of government in the house of commons, without ever proposing any thing that, in the end, could become prejudicial to the people.

Throughout the whole nation, the election for members to serve in parliament went in favour of the ministry, who had acquired such an ascendancy, that every thing gave way to them. Few disturbances happened; and the writs being returned, the duke of Cumberland, in commission, with some other noblemen, opened the session, Mr. Onslow being chosen speaker of the house of commons. The lord-chancellor Hardwick, now raised to the dignity of an earl, informed the members, that his majesty had called them together, in order to consult on some things of the utmost importance, which would be laid before them in proper time; and doubted not but they would do every thing to support the honour of the crown, and secure the interest of the nation. But nothing of any importance was done: for the parliament, which met on the tenth of May, was prorogued on the fifth of June; so that all business which naturally came under their consideration was suspended till the month of November following:

The depredations made by the French on the properties of our subjects in North-America, had occasioned several remonstrances to be made to the court of Versailles; but no satisfactory answers were received, every one being evasive and uncertain. This induced our ministry to send an express order to Mr. Dinwiddie, one of the North-American governors, to drive the French out of his province, and to erect forts, to prevent their future incursions. In consequence of these orders, some skirmishes happened: and as it seemed reasonable to believe that the French intended to commence hostilities, the earl of Albemarle, our ambassador at Paris, was ordered to remonstrate upon it to the French ministry, as a breach of the faith of treaties, and inconsistent with the law of nations. The earl obeyed his orders; but, instead of receiving a satisfactory answer, the French began gradually to pull off the mask, and new reinforcements were sent to America, in the same manner as if war had been declared between both nations. From which we may learn, that no confidence is to be put in such perfidious people at any time.

During this year, the queen-mother of Spain lost all her influence at court, by the disgrace of her favourite, the marquis de la Ensenada, who was succeeded by Mr. Wall, the son of an Irish papist, who followed the fortune of James II. at the revolution. The king of Portugal, who had received many favours from the English, began to act in the most ungrateful manner. He imposed some severe taxes upon the British merchants in the factory at Lisbon, and even went so far as to cause some of them to be imprisoned.

In Denmark, Sweden, and Russia, as well as Germany, every thing remained in a state of tranquillity, although nothing had been left undone by the court of France to draw some of the above powers over to their measures. In America, the French continued to carry on their encroachments in a bolder manner than ever. Great complaints were exhibited against them, and the people in general wished for the meeting of the parliament, which took place on the fourteenth day of November.

His majesty, in his speech, informed them, that he had done every thing to preserve the public peace of Europe, and that no material alteration had taken place since their last session. He recommended to them to take into their consideration the affairs of America, but took no notice of the encroachments made by the French on our settlements. This was considered, by the more discerning of the people, as one of the greatest master-strokes of policy; for the minority in the house were gaining ground; and it was expected, had his majesty discovered the real state of American affairs, violent opposition would have been made to the address, which is always expected at the beginning of each session.

The address being presented, the commons voted that the sum of four millions, seventy-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven pounds, should be granted for the service of the current year. Subsidies were also granted to several foreign princes, particularly the elector of Bavaria, who was to have a body of forces ready, in case his majesty's dominions in Germany should be attacked by the French, or any other of the European powers. These vigorous resolutions of the house of commons alarmed the French to the highest degree; but as they had all along acted in the most insincere manner, so, on the present occasion, they directed their ambassador, the duke de Mirepoix, to amuse our ministry with pretences, that they had not the most distant view of disturbing such of our subjects as were settled in America. These declarations were, however, of too fallacious a nature to have any effect with the people of England. The eyes of our ministry were now opened, and nothing seemed so necessary as that of supporting the interest and honour of the nation.

A. D. 1755. A proclamation was issued on the twenty-third day of January, offering a bounty to such seamen as were willing to enter into his majesty's service. Press-warrants were sent to the principal sea-port towns: all artificers in our dock-yards, as well as seamen, were prohibited, under severe penalties, from entering into foreign service: and all such as were abroad, were commanded to return. Things were now grown to such an height, that the designs of the French could be no longer concealed; and therefore the king sent a message to the parliament by Sir Thomas Robinson, informing them, that the encroachments made on our settlements in America rendered it necessary for him to augment both his navy and army, and he doubted not but his faithful subjects would stand by him with their lives and fortunes. Affectionate and loyal addresses were presented by both houses: and although the French boasted much of the superior power of their fleets in Brest and Toulon, yet the British subjects paid little regard to it. The ministry prohibited the Irish from supplying the French with provisions, which was one of the best measures that could have been taken, and was applauded by the people in general.

Great dispatch was made by our ministry to fit out the fleet; and towards the latter end of April, admiral Boscawen sailed from Portsmouth with ten ships of the line, and six frigates, in which were six thousand soldiers and marines. About the same time, sailed from Brest the French fleet, under the command of admiral Macnamara, an Irish gentleman; but he had secret instructions to dispatch his vice-admiral in his room, while he himself, with five ships of the line, cruized near the straits of Gibraltar, with no other view than to try whether he could not oblige our admiral to divide his fleet, which had been reinforced by a squadron under the command of admiral Holborne. Mr. Pitt, at that time secretary at war, procured an act which will ever do honour to his memory, namely, to advance six months pay to the seamen, and not suffer them to sell their tickets to rapacious usurers, who often bought them at the rate of fifty per cent. discount, to the dishonour of the nation.

The

The public business being dispatched, his majesty went to the house of peers and told them, he adhered, in the most sacred manner, to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle; but as the French had, in the most barefaced manner, broken through every article of it, he could not, consistent with the honour of his crown, and the duty he owed to his people, suffer them to proceed any further without the most vigorous opposition. He added, that he never would declare war but upon the most justifiable terms; and concluded, by assuring them, that he trusted for success in the Divine Providence, which was ever ready to assist those who acted justly. He then prorogued the parliament, and having made choice of a proper regency to conduct the public affairs, set out to visit his electoral dominions. While he was there he learned, that the French king had entered into a secret treaty with the court of Vienna; and to prevent any evil consequences that might result therefrom, he engaged to take into his pay a large body of Hessian troops; and, at the same time, concluded a treaty offensive and defensive, with the empress of Russia.

While his majesty was, in concert with his ministry, contriving such schemes as were most likely to be of service to the nation in general, the French were continuing their depredations on our settlements, and the inhabitants of the American colonies were quarrelling with their governors. This induced all them who wished well to our interests in America, to look down, in the most unfavourable manner, on the unprosperous state of the public affairs. Unanimity was wished for; but few expected it. Admiral Boscawen, who was now off Louisbourg, attacked part of the French fleet, and actually dispersed them, which gave some gleam of hope to the people of England, who promised themselves great things from the superior abilities of that commander. Two of the French ships were taken and sent to Halifax in Nova Scotia, where they were afterwards condemned as lawful prizes.

A trifling expedition was made in the month of June this year, on the frontiers of the colony established by the French in Canada; but no other consequences resulted from it than that of keeping up the spirits of the people. On the other hand, during the same month, general Braddock marched, at the head of two thousand regulars, in order to attack fort Du Quesne; but met with so many obstacles, that his little army was much reduced: for the colonists, who had long quarrelled with their governors, refused to send him such waggons and provisions as were necessary for his assistance. However, under all these difficulties, he arrived, on the eighth of July, within ten miles of fort Du Quesne; and the French, having, by their spies, received intelligence of all his motions, advanced to meet him, and encamped in a very advantageous situation. Prudence is equally necessary in a general as resolution; and he ought to know when to act on the offensive or the defensive; but that quality was wanting in Braddock. Sir Peter Halket, the second in command, advised him to cultivate the friendship of the Indians, and send some of them as an advanced guard; because they were much better acquainted with the country than the regulars, who had never been in those parts before. But nothing could prevail with the general, nor would he suffer a council of war to be held; so that, regardless of danger, he marched forward, as if he had been sure of victory. The French, who had taken every necessary precaution, came out of their entrenchments to meet him; while the Indians in their interest, whom they had concealed in a wood, burst out upon the English, and galled them in flank, while the regulars attacked their front. The general behaved with great courage; but after having five horses killed under him, he received a mortal wound, of which he died. Soon after Sir Peter Halket and his son were both killed; and in general many of the officers shared the same fate; for the French had given orders to the Indians to aim at them, while the regulars were engaged. This was a fatal stroke to the English, and attended with the most dreadful consequences to those who lived in the back settlements; for the Indians in the interest of the French, poured upon them in great numbers, and committed the most horrid barbarities.

It was the general opinion, that it would be too late to take the field during the remainder of the season; and therefore, instead of attacking Crown-Point, it was resolved, that during the winter, the forces should be employed in keeping up a communication between that place and Albany. General Shirley took upon him the command of one part of the troops, but his conduct was much censured; while that of general Johnson, who commanded the other part, was equally applauded. The ministry were sensible of his vast abilities, and therefore he was created a baronet; and, at the same time, received a present of five thousand pounds.

In Europe, the ministers of the different courts were employed in attempting to deceive each other; while those who spent their time in the study of politics, attempted, in vain, to discover their real intentions.

As the French could not, with common decency, conceal their real intentions any longer, they endeavoured to persuade the Spaniards that it was their duty to prevent the British navy from becoming formidable in America; but Mr. Wall, their chief minister, was a sincere friend to the English, and consequently did every thing to frustrate the designs of the French. They had pretended that we were the aggressors in North America; and when the king of Spain offered to become a mediator between the contending parties, he was given to understand, that no suspension of arms could be agreed upon as had been demanded by the French, till reparation had been made to our colonists for the injuries they had suffered. This induced the French ministry to intrigue with the German princes, and brought over to their interest the elector of Cologne, who promised to give them leave to form magazines in his territories. From this circumstance, the people of England were convinced that the designs of the French was to attack Hanover, and for that purpose they entered into a confederacy with the court of Vienna, with a design of distressing the king of Prussia. Nothing was left undone by his Britannic majesty to secure his electoral dominions; and for that purpose he formed several alliances with the German princes. A second treaty was also entered into between our sovereign, and the empress of Russia; but it did not take effect. News arrived that admiral Boscawen had obtained some considerable advantages over the French; and much about the same time, Sir Edward Hawke sailed from Portsmouth with eighteen ships of the line, in order to intercept the French fleet; but they had the good fortune to escape and get safe into Brest. Four men of war were dispatched from Portsmouth, under the command of commodore Frankland, to protect our sugar plantations from the enemy, and likewise to exercise plenary powers in committing hostilities wherever it should seem necessary, or where he should happen to meet with opposition.

Orders were sent to all our naval officers to seize such of the French ships as they could lay hold of; and the duke de Mirepoix, who was not able to deceive our ministry any longer, set out on his return home without taking leave.

The king, who had been in Hanover, during the greatest part of the summer, returned to England on the fifteenth of September, and on the thirteenth of November, both houses of parliament met; when the king, in his speech from the throne, informed them that he had taken every necessary precaution to secure the peace of Europe, and to protect his subjects in America from the insults of the French; but although he had done every thing to convince the world of his pacific disposition, yet there seemed no appearance of an accommodation. That he wished for peace, but never would submit to it upon dishonourable terms; and therefore had concluded several treaties with the princes on the continent, in order to be ready to assist him in case of war being declared.

Great debates arose in both houses concerning the addresses that should be presented to his majesty on the subject of his speech; for many lords and gentlemen disapproved of his having concluded treaties, without previously asking their advice. However, after a most violent contest, the addresses were presented, which occasioned several resignations; particularly, that of Mr. Pitt, pay-master of the forces, who was succeeded by the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay, while Sir George Lyttleton was appointed chancellor of the exchequer in the room of Mr. Legge. When the public business came on before the house of commons, every thing went in favour of the ministry; and the treaties concluded by his majesty were approved of by a very great majority. Subsidies were granted to the empress of Russia, the elector of Bavaria, and the prince of Hesse-Cassel; but the son of the latter, for reasons unknown, renounced the protestant religion, which gave great offence to all the other princes of that persuasion, especially to his Britannic majesty, who had bestowed upon him his daughter in marriage.

On the first of November this year, a most dreadful calamity happened at Lisbon, which laid great part of that city in ruins. The inquisition having condemned several protestants and others, whom they considered as disaffected to the Romish church, All-Saints day was appointed for their execution, or as they call it, the celebration of an act of faith. Many of the ignorant people from the country, had assembled at Lisbon, to be witnesses of this horrid spectacle; but as protestants, if found among the mob, are sure to be treated with every mark of indignity, so the gentlemen of the English factory retired quietly to their apartments. During the morning the sky had continued serene and clear, a cloud was not to be seen; but about ten o'clock in the forenoon, a most dreadful shock of an earthquake was felt, and the water in the river Tagus rose above ten feet perpendicular. On the altars of the several churches, tapers had been lighted to celebrate the horrid solemnity, and the violence of the concussion having thrown them down, they set fire to the other materials, and in a few minutes the whole city seemed to be on a blaze. In many parts the earth opened, as if ready to devour the superstitious inhabitants, and according to the most moderate computation, no less than eight thousand persons of both sexes perished. The survivors were obliged to take shelter in the adjacent fields, where they could not procure the necessaries of life, and many of them perished with cold and hunger. Our ambassador at the court of Madrid having transmitted an account of this calamity to our ministry, his majesty, touched with the circumstances of the unhappy sufferers, went to the parliament house, and informed the members; who, to their everlasting honour, ordered that one hundred thousand pounds should be sent to relieve their immediate wants. The king of Portugal was so sensible of this instance of British generosity, that he wrote a most grateful and affecting letter to our sovereign, promising that on every occasion, for the future, he would take care to provide for the interest of our subjects when they came to settle in his dominions.

A rumour now took place, and was actually propagated throughout the kingdom, that the French intended to invade this nation; upon which all hopes of peace were given up, though the French still submitted to all the indignities which our navy offered them. It seems they wanted a pretence for entering into a new war, and nothing seemed more likely to give colour to such a measure, as that of our men of war seizing the ships belonging to their merchants.

The Esperance man of war, a French ship of eighty guns, having been sent from Rochfort to Brest, was met by captain Stephens in the Orford, of seventy guns, and after a desperate engagement, that lasted three hours, the Frenchman, with above three hundred sailors on board, was taken and carried into Plymouth, so that notwithstanding war was not formally declared, yet the hostilities committed, shewed that it could not be far distant.

A.D. 1756. This year opened with parliamentary business of the most important nature; for it was ordered that all the old regiments, both of dragoons and foot, should be augmented, and that ten new regiments of foot, besides several troops of light horse, should be immediately raised. For defraying the whole public expence, the parliament granted the sum of seven millions, two hundred and ninety-eight thousand, five hundred and fifteen pounds. Many excellent laws passed this session of parliament, and in general, the members were unanimous; so that few arguments were used in opposition, to what was proposed by the ministry. War was now apparently inevitable; but while the court of Great Britain was deliberating on the most proper methods to be used in prosecuting it, an incident took place that surprized all Europe, and gave a new and most unexpected turn to the face of public affairs.

The king of Prussia, who had spent several years in cultivating the arts of peace, discovered such profound knowledge in the art of politics, that no treaty of the most secret nature could be long concealed from him. By his secret emissaries, in different countries, he learned that the empress of Russia, in conjunction with the French and the empress queen of Hungary, had entered into a league offensive and defensive, and that Silesia was not only to be retaken and annexed to the house of Austria, but likewise all the hereditary dominions of the king of Prussia were to be divided among the conquerors; and this treaty was acceded to by Augustus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland. As we had agreed to bring some Russian troops into the empire of Germany, in order to defend the electorate of Hanover, the Prussian monarch published a manifesto, wherein he declared that he was ready to take the field, at the head of his whole army, to oppose the entrance of any forces that should presume to come into the empire. This was a most mortifying stroke to our sovereign, who imagined that his electoral dominions would be seized by the French; and therefore it was proposed by our ministry that nothing could contribute more towards securing Hanover, than that of entering into a treaty with the king of Prussia. Proposals of the like nature had been made to him by the French; but he had already such proofs of their perfidy, that he paid no regard to any thing advanced by them. Accordingly, it was agreed upon between him and the court of Great Britain, that in consequence of the war having broke out in North America, there was reason to fear that it might extend further, both the contracting powers should exert themselves to the utmost, in order to prevent any foreign troops from coming into the empire, or to pass through it, that the public peace might be maintained.

On the twenty-third of March his majesty went to the house of peers, and the commons being sent for, he informed them, there was great reason to fear that the French intended to invade this kingdom, because of the vast naval preparations making by them along the coast. He proposed that six thousand Hessian troops should be immediately taken into the pay of Great Britain, and that they should be sent over to this kingdom to prevent the designs of the enemy. But what was very remarkable, was his majesty's not having taken the least notice, that general Blakeney, governor of Fort St. Philip, and Sir Benjamin Keene, our ambassador at the court of Madrid, had both sent letters to the secretary of state, informing him, that the French were fitting out a large squadron at Toulon, and that there was not the least doubt but they intended to attack the island of Minorca, and the general requested that proper assistance should be sent him.

What could induce the ministry to act in such a manner, will remain a secret for ever, so far as we are able to learn; but certain it is, nothing could be more unjustifiable, and the consequences proved fatal to the nation. Those who wished well to the nation, censured their conduct in the severest manner, but still the ministerial influence prevailed, and bore down all opposition. Such as were real patriots moved, that the militia might be raised to defend the nation, and that no mercenary troops should be hired; but the ministry, as if they had intended to exasperate the people to the utmost, made a motion in the lower house, that an humble address be presented to his majesty, desiring that he would take into British pay twelve battalions of his electoral troops, and that they should be brought over to this kingdom. Great opposition was made to this motion, but the ministry carried their point; in consequence of which, the nation was, in a manner, filled with foreign troops, and the people discontented. The vulgar rabble, who were ever fired with indignation at the arrival of foreigners, wanted an opportunity to quarrel with these poor men, who could not be supposed to have any connection with public affairs; but their behaviour was so inoffensive, that even their most inveterate enemies could not find fault with them.

The British ministry, who, for some time, appeared to act as men whose eyes had been shut, began to see the necessity they were under of protecting the island of Minorca; and accordingly it was resolved that a fleet should be sent into the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng, son of lord Torrington, who procured a peerage by his vast knowledge of naval affairs. The abilities of Mr. Byng had never been called in question: he had served in several expeditions, and had made himself agreeable, both to the officers and seamen. No person could be found endowed with more sensibility, and humanity seemed to be his darling passion. Along with him, as second in command, was Mr. West, a man of great abilities, and much esteemed both for his courage and prudence. It will scarcely be credited in future ages, that our ministry acted only upon principles of ignorance; for discerning persons will ascribe their conduct to something of a criminal nature.

The fleet did not sail from Spithead till the seventh of April; and during their voyage to Gibraltar, which lasted till the second of May, many of the seamen were taken sick, and, consequently, the fleet much weakened. He had only one battalion of land forces on board; and when he got into the harbour of Gibraltar, general Fowke, who commanded the garrison, refused to give him any of his men, alledging, as an excuse, that he had not sufficient to defend the place, in case an attack should be made. He learned farther, that M. de la Galissoniere, the French admiral, had sailed from Toulon with a large fleet of the line, besides transports, on board of which he had no less than fifteen thousand land forces, which he had landed in Minorca, and taken possession of every thing except the fort of St. Philip.

This fleet, of which our ministry had received repeated accounts, sailed from Toulon on the tenth of April, just three days after Mr. Byng sailed from Portsmouth; and the inequality of the voyages being so great, there is no wonder that they got there before our fleet could so much as enter into the Mediterranean. General Blakeney, who had notice of the approach of the French, took care to provide for the security of Fort St. Philip, as far as was possible, considering what a small number of men he had then under his command. It was in vain for him to attempt to defend the rest of the island, and consequently, the French forces landed, without opposition, at a place called Ciudadalla, on the western part of the island, and prepared to attack Fort St. Philip. The duke de Richlieu was at the head of this expedition; and when he landed, he found that he had neglected to bring horses with him to draw the heavy artillery over roads that had been, in a manner, rendered impassable by order of general Blakeney. This circumstance obliged him to re-embark his heavy artillery, and land it at Mahon, near St. Philip's, where he intended to erect his batteries. In the mean time, the general sent a messenger to the French marshal, demanding to know why he had landed in the island of Minorca in a hostile manner; and received for answer, that he acted in conformity with the practice of the English, who had taken some of their men of war without making a public declaration of their intentions.

On the eleventh of May, the entrenchments were opened; and marshal Richlieu sent his compliments to general Blakeney, offering him what conditions he pleased to accept of; but the governor told the messenger, that it would be soon enough to treat of terms when they came so near each other as to be able to shake hands. Accordingly, the royal standard was placed upon the castle, as a signal that the garrison would defend it to the last extremity. But here our attention is called off to objects partly different, and partly connected with it.

Admiral Byng, while at Gibraltar, sent an express to the lords of the admiralty, informing them, that he had been sent on an expedition at an improper season; that he had not force sufficient to oppose the French; and that there was great reason to fear that all his attempts would be rendered abortive. This message from the admiral gave great offence to the ministry, who were conscious that they had acted inconsistent with their duty; and therefore they caused a report to be propagated, that Byng would never face the French. This increased the public clamour; and on the nineteenth of May, the English fleet came to an anchor off the island of Minorca. Captain Hervey was dispatched with a letter to general Blakeney, to inform him of the arrival of the fleet, and to know in what part of the island he would have the recruits landed; but before he had got out of sight of the admiral's ship, the French fleet appeared, and seemed to be very strong; but the admiral made the necessary dispositions for attacking them.

During the night, nothing of importance happened; and when the morning appeared, there was such a thick fog, that the fleets lost sight of each other; but about noon the sky clearing up, the line of battle was formed, and admiral West bore down upon the French. Had West been properly seconded, there is reason to believe that the enemy would have been defeated; but admiral Byng, although in every respect a brave officer, yet, on the present occasion, laid his conduct open to much censure. It seems that the admiral was distracted in his opinion, whether to retreat or advance; for when the captain of his own ship desired him to bear down upon the enemy, he peremptorily refused, lest he should fall into the same error as admiral Matthews had done some years before. No sign of cowardice was discovered in the whole of Mr. Byng's conduct, but he acted in such an absurd manner, that the ships most fit for action did not come up; so that the enemy, who had rather acted on the defensive, had an opportunity of sailing away.

During four days that the English fleet remained waiting for the return of the French, several councils of war were held, in which it was at last agreed, that they should set sail for Gibraltar, not having forces sufficient to protect Fort St. Philip. This was one of the most imprudent steps that could have been taken; for had they remained but one day longer, they would have intercepted a large fleet, laden with provisions and military stores, for the use of the French army in Minorca. It was above a month before the fleet arrived at Gibraltar; and news of their miscarriage being published, admiral Hawke, assisted by admiral Saunders, was sent into the Mediterranean, terranean, with orders to supersede admiral Byng, who, with general Fowke, the deputy-governor of Gibraltar, were put under an arrest, and sent prisoners to England in the Antelope man of war, in order to be tried by two different court-martials.

In the mean time, the French carried on the siege of Fort St. Philip with great vigour, while the garrison made a most gallant defence. The French army amounted to upwards of twenty thousand men, with sixty-two large battering cannon, and twenty-one mortars, which kept playing incessantly on the fort. On the fifteenth of June, general Blakeney ordered a most furious attack to be made on the enemy, by which they were, for some time, driven back, and many of their batteries were demolished.

The soldiers in the garrison did not exceed two thousand five hundred in number; and the French general being well supplied with every thing necessary for carrying on the siege, destroyed most of the out-works, and then made a breach in the wall.

On the twenty-seventh, the duke de Richlieu put himself at the head of a large detachment, and attacked the place sword in hand, which was gallantly defended by the English, who disputed every inch of the ground with them. Several of the mines were sprung, and such execution was done upon the enemy, that great part of the glacis was covered with dead bodies. But notwithstanding, the French continued the attack, and made themselves masters of two strong redoubts: and colonel Jefferies, the second in command under general Blakeney, was suddenly surrounded, and, with one hundred men, taken prisoners, just at the instant that he was on the point of retaking one of the redoubts. Major Cunningham, another brave officer, was so desperately wounded, that he could not do his duty: so that the governor was deprived of the assistance of two men whose courage and prudence had rendered them very conspicuous. The duke de Richlieu then ordered a parley to be beat, under pretence of burying the dead; but no sooner had the governor granted his request, than he made use of the time in fortifying the redoubts he had taken, by which he became master of all the subterraneous passages, so as to be able to blow up the fort. The general finding it, in a manner, impossible to hold out against such a numerous army, which was daily encroaching upon him, called a council of war, in which it was resolved that the place could not hold out any longer, but that proposals must be made to the French to enter upon articles of capitulation.

The duke de Richlieu was so sensible of the bravery of the English general, that he offered them what terms they pleased; and accordingly they were permitted to march out with all the honours of war, and to remain in the island till ships came from Gibraltar to take them on board, which was not till the seventh of July. In this manner was Britain deprived of the island of Minorca, a place of the utmost importance during a war, because it affords provisions and harbours of safety for all such vessels as happen to go from England to the Mediterranean. The importance of it was not known till it was lost; and had we been at war with any of the Italian states, we could scarce have had an opportunity of sending a fleet beyond Gibraltar.

In the beginning of this year, the earl of Loudon had been sent to America, to take upon him the command of the army destined to act in that quarter of the world; but so negligent had the ministry been in fitting him out in proper time, that before he landed, he found the French general Montcalm in the field, at the head of a considerable army. In the mean time, Oswego, a strong fort situated on the lake Ontario, in Canada, was taken by the French, and all the men found in it sent prisoners to Montreal. The loss of this important place was owing entirely to the delays made by our ministry, and the altercations that took place between our generals and the colonists. Fort Granville fell into the hands of the French at the same time, which struck such a damp into the minds of the people, both in the mother-country and on the continent of America, that nothing was to be heard but murmurs, while the conduct of our officers was severely censured.

In the East-Indies, the French had been very active in spurring up the natives against our settlements, particularly in Bengal, where the new nabob, Surajah Dowla, took the field, and laid siege to the town of Calcutta. The governor, Mr. Drake, being a Quaker, refused to fight; so that the command devolved upon Mr. Holwell, who resolved to hold it out to the last extremity. But the enemy's army was almost innumerable, and the place but poorly fortified. Add to this, that the ships belonging to the company had fallen down the river, which the nabob knew, and resolved to avail himself of that circumstance. He would not hearken to any terms of capitulation, although Mr. Holwell proposed them to him, but, by mere force of numbers, rushing into the place, cruelly ordered the governor, with one hundred and forty-five men, to be confined in a dungeon, where one hundred and twenty-three perished before morning for want of fresh air. This was one of the most horrid transactions that we meet with in history; it was directly opposite to the laws of war, and contrary to the principles upon which civil government is founded. The governor, Mr. Holwell, with such others as survived, were sent prisoners to the nabob's capital, far up the country, where they were treated with great cruelty. On the other hand, admiral Watson defeated, and took prisoner, Angria, a famous pirate, who reigned like a sovereign on the coast of Malabar; and in his castle was found the sum of one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. This was a valuable acquisition. But we must now return to take a view of the state of public affairs in Europe.

War had been hitherto carried on, without any public declaration thereof, either by the French or English: but as it seemed no way necessary to keep the mask on any longer, England declared war, by proclamation, on the eighteenth of May, which was answered by another at Paris, in the most formal manner, on the eleventh of June following.

The city of London, followed by many corporations throughout the kingdom, presented most loyal addresses to his majesty upon the declaration of war, and promised to support him with their lives and fortunes: so that our aged sovereign had the pleasure to find that he reigned as an object of love in the hearts of his subjects.

In the mean time, the empress of Russia, highly exasperated that we should have entered into a treaty with the king of Prussia without consulting her, ordered her army to be augmented considerably; and, at the same time, in order to conceal her real intentions, ordered her ministers at foreign courts to publish manifestos, intimating, that she had nothing in view but that of protecting her own dominions. The empress-queen of Hungary proceeded in the same manner; so that the flames of civil war were now lighted up on the continent of Europe; while the king of Prussia, ever attentive to his own interest, and the security of his subjects, resolved to be beforehand with both, and prevent them from taking those advantages which they intended.

No prince could ever be more active, on this occasion, than the king of Prussia; for the moment he learned that the court of France had entered into an alliance with the empress-queen, he ordered his minister at the court of Dresden to demand leave for a body of his forces to pass through Saxony; but instead of receiving an answer, the elector ordered all his forces to be collected together, and encamped at Pirna, till such time as he could receive reinforcements of Austrians, to enable him to take the field. This so exasperated the king of Prussia, that he took the field at the head of a most formidable army, and obliged the elector of Saxony to depart to Poland, to which nation he was conducted by a body of dragoons; while all the treasures and archives belonging to his hereditary dominions were seized; and his army made prisoners of war. Leipzig surrendered at the same time to the conqueror; and the people were obliged to provide, not only all sorts of necessaries for the Prussian army, but also to furnish them with money to carry on their conquests.

On the first of October, the king of Prussia came up with the Austrian army, and resolved to give them battle, having first shewn his generals the situation of the ground, and acquainted them with the steps that he intended to take. The Austrians having neglected to take possession of some rising grounds, the king of Prussia gave orders for his troops to advance, and attack the enemy's cavalry, who were posted in an adjoining plain. Indeed, the attack was made with so much fury, that the Austrian cavalry gave way, and fell back upon the infantry: upon which the Prussians advanced with such courage, that although sixty pieces of cannon played upon them, yet they made themselves masters of all the ditches and defiles. The Austrian army being thus put into confusion, they began to give way, which the king of Prussia observing, ordered the whole body of his infantry to advance, and wheel about to the left, where they attacked the suburbs of Lowoschütz, and reduced the whole to a heap of ashes. Count Brown, who commanded the Austrian army, was obliged to retreat in the best manner he could, leaving the honour of the victory to the Prussians, after an engagement that lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon. The Prussian monarch was not, however, able to make his enterprize of any great advantage to himself; for the winter approaching, he was obliged to put his troops into quarters of cantonment at Dresden, and along the Elbe. Count Schwerin commanded another part of his army, which had penetrated into Bohemia; and they finding that provisions could not easily be procured, returned towards Silesia, and took up their quarters in the province of Glatz.

The discontents among the people of England were now increased to such an height, that it was found necessary to make some changes in the ministry. Accordingly, the duke of Devonshire was appointed first lord of the treasury, in room of the duke of Newcastle; Mr. Legge was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; earl Temple was made first lord of the Admiralty; and the seals, as secretary of state, were given to Mr. Pitt, one of the greatest statesmen that ever lived in Britain.

On the second of December, his majesty went to the house of peers; and the commons being sent for, he told them, that, under the protection of the divine providence, he doubted not but he should be able to frustrate all the schemes hatched against him by his perfidious enemies. He told them, that nothing could so much engage his attention, next to the mother country, as the preservation of America; and, for that reason, that the war should be prosecuted with the utmost vigour. He added, that nothing could contribute more towards distressing the enemy, than internal peace among his subjects; and therefore recommended to them unanimity in all their deliberations. The militia (he said) was one of the most favourite objects he had in view, with respect to the preservation of the nation; and therefore he told them, that it was their duty to put it upon the most respectable footing. He concluded by telling them, that no measure should be undertaken by him, but by the advice of his parliament, in whom he placed the utmost confidence. Both houses presented the most loyal and affectionate addresses, and then proceeded to the dispatch of public business.

A. D. 1757. The committee of supply granted his majesty the privilege of keeping on foot forty-nine thousand seven hundred soldiers, and fifty-five thousand seamen. The Hessians and Hanoverians were still kept in pay, but most cruelly used by the people: for one of them having committed a misdemeanor, punishable in this country by the common law, his commander not knowing any difference between municipal and military law, ordered him to be tried by a court-martial. This part of the officer's conduct, although not justifiable, yet could not be attended with any dangerous consequences, especially as the man was a soldier, and a foreigner; but notwithstanding, the people were exasperated to such a degree of madness, that they would not suffer them to lodge in their houses: Distressed as these poor creatures were with cold, they never complained, but lay in the fields in tents till the month of January, when the legislative power, in the most compassionate manner, made proper provision for them.

The great dearth of corn, owing to the iniquitous practice of engrossing, reduced many persons, and indeed the nation in general, to great distress. Tumults happened in almost every part of the kingdom; which is not to be wondered at, when it is considered, that the people were starving in the midst of plenty. His majesty, touched with the sufferings of his people, recommended their distressed condition to parliament; and an act was passed to prohibit, for a limited time, the exportation of all sorts of grain.

As there was too much reason to fear that the French would invade this kingdom, and as it was necessary that great part of our regular forces should be employed abroad, so a bill was brought into parliament to establish a national militia, on an extensive and useful plan. This was such a constitutional measure, as gave pleasure to the nation in general; and yet some discontented persons exclaimed so loudly against it, that many of the people, particularly in Yorkshire, actually rose in a body, and demolished the house where the justices of the peace and deputy lieutenants had met to make choice of such as were to serve.

On the fifteenth of February, his majesty sent a message to the house of commons, to inform them, that the French were daily pouring such numbers of troops into Germany, that there was reason to fear they had some design on his electoral dominions. He therefore recommended Hanover to their protection, not doubting but his faithful commons would assist him to the utmost. In answer to this message, most loyal addresses were presented by both houses; and it was voted, that an annual subsidy should be paid to the king of Prussia, and that an army of observation should act on the borders of Hanover, under the command of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, to watch the motions of the French, and preserve that electorate from their making any encroachments upon it.

At the same time, great preparations were made for the naval service; and a design was formed to take from the French Louisbourg, the capital of Cape Breton. Sir Edward Hawke, with the admirals Saunders and Osborne, were sent to North-America with considerable fleets; and general Hopson, with lord Charles Hay, had under them six thousand two hundred land forces. Two squadrons were dispatched at the same time, one to the East, and the other to the West-Indies; so that every thing was done for the interest of the nation: but such of the former ministry as had been discarded, made such opposition to these measures, that Mr. Pitt, and the honourable Mr. Legge, who had acted as the most steady and upright patriots against every thing that seemed to threaten any hurt to the nation, were commanded to resign. They did not, however, retire from public business, without receiving the approbation of their fellow subjects; for most of the cities and corporations presented them with addresses, and their freedom in gold boxes.

Distress and discontent, during the first part of this year, reigned in every part of the nation. Bread was so dear, that the poor could scarce purchase it. And although admiral Byng, whose conduct had given such offence, had been shot at Portsmouth, yet the people in general looked upon him as rather unfor-fortunate than criminal. They considered him as one who had been sacrificed to screen the ministry from censure; and although a parliamentary enquiry was made into their conduct, yet they contrived to act in such a manner, that the whole came to nothing. The only good effects attending the execution of the admiral was, the riviving a true spirit of courage among our officers, both by sea and land. From this circumstance they saw and were convinced, that no station, let it be ever so dignified, could screen them from punishment; and that the only way to true honour and real glory, was to discharge their duty faithfully.

His majesty finding the public clamour extremely high, made another change in his ministry; and Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were reinstated in their former employments, to the inexpressible pleasure of the nation in general. The parliament was prorogued on the fourth of July, when his majesty thanked the commons for the generous supply granted for the support of the war, and recommended to them to carry with them, to their respective counties, a spirit of unanimity, as the most sure means of procuring the favour of divine providence.

In France, a circumstance had nearly happened that might have changed the face of public affairs; namely, an attempt to murder the king. Francis Damien, a native of French Flanders, was the person who undertook the performance of this action. He had lived some years as a footman in different families in Paris, but had been turned away for an obstinate temper, and a certain gloominess that made him disagreeable to all those with whom he had any connections. It does not appear that he had any accomplices, nor could the torture itself make him discover what were his motives. On the fifth of January, about six in the evening, as the king was getting into his coach to go to Trianon, on a visit to his daughter, the unhappy wretch, having concealed a large clasp knife under his cloak, slipped thro' the guards and made a stroke at the king with his knife. The point pierced between the fourth and fifth ribs, but it was not mortal; and the assassin, who seemed not to be any ways concerned, was immediately seized and committed to prison. He was soon after brought to his trial, according to the laws of France, and executed in such a horrid manner, as is even shocking to relate. Incisions were made in his flesh with red hot pincers, and melted lead poured into them. In that manner the poor wretch was tortured several hours, and then torn in pieces by four horses, after which his quarters were reduced to ashes.

The French, in the spring of this year, had sent two armies to Germany; the one, consisting of eighty thousand men, under the command of marshal d'Etrees, an officer of the most undaunted courage, and under him were marshal de Contades, and the count de St. Germain, who had been from their most early infancy, accustomed to arms. The other army consisted only of twenty-five thousand men, because it was to be joined by a body of Austrians; but the grand army was to attack Hanover. In Bohemia, one hundred thousand Austrians had taken the field; an equal number of Russians were marching through Poland; while the Swedes, crossing the Baltic, attacked the most important places in Pomerania. Surrounded on all sides with enemies, the king of Prussia, instead of being discouraged, seemed rather to encrease every day in all those arts of heroism that constitute the character of an able general.

In the beginning of the year he marched from Dresden, across two bridges thrown over the Elbe, attended by field-marshal Keith, and several other generals of approved abilities. They marched in three bodies or divisions; nor did the Austrians so much as know that he had taken the field till he had advanced a considerable way into Bohemia. He ordered the prince of Bevern to march as if he had intended to attack Egria, with a small detachment of the army, upon which count Brown, the Austrian general, sent Arenberg, with a detachment, to oppose him. This was just what the king of Prussia wished for; and laying hold of that circumstance, wheeled to the right, and cut off all communication between the grand army of the Austrians and the detachment under general Arenberg. This was such a master-piece of generalship as is scarce to be met with in history; but the Austrians did not understand it. They imagined that the king intended to retreat; and consequently were drawn off their guard and led into a snare.

On the fifth of April the prince of Bevern, having passed some of the most dangerous defiles, gained a complete victory over the detachment of the Austrian army, and so opened the whole country for the rest of the Prussian forces. In the mean time the king kept marching along the Elbe, to observe the motions of count Brown; and drove the Austrians from their strong camp at Budin.

On the sixth of May, the different detachments of the Austrians being collected together, instead of attacking the Prussians, encamped on the banks of the Moldau, near Prague. There the king of Prussia, as if no enterprize had been too great for his abilities, attempted to flank count Brown, who had no other means left but that of wheeling to the right, to save his army. Every difficulty gave way to the Prussians; one defile was taken after another; but in one of their attacks on an advanced body of the Austrians, field-marshal Schwerin, a brave officer, was killed at the age of eighty-two, crowned with military glory, and sincerely regretted by his sovereign, who had long been convinced, that he was one of the bravest generals that ever commanded an army.

This brought on a general engagement, and the Prussians, with the most amazing courage, broke through the right wing of the Austrians, and made themselves masters of several batteries; while a body of cavalry broke the front line, and put the whole into such confusion, that above six thousand were killed; among whom were several generals, besides marshal Brown, the commander in chief. The Prussians drove the Austrians into the city of Prague, and in four days the trenches were opened and lines of circumvallation drawn. It could not be supposed that such a vast army as that of the Austrians would be able to subsist long in a city that had not provisions sufficient for the inhabitants; and therefore prince Charles of Lorraine resolved to cut his way through the Prussian lines, at the head of twelve thousand men. The time agreed upon for putting this scheme in execution was the middle of the night; but in the mean time, one of the Austrian soldiers having deserted, gave an account of the whole to the king of Prussia, who took care to be upon his guard, so that the prince, with his party, was defeated, and obliged once more to take refuge in the city. The heavy artillery belonging to the Prussians being now arrived, a most dreadful cannonade began, and great part of the city was reduced to a heap of rubbish. Provisions were become so scarce, that they were obliged to eat horses flesh; and the Prussians, who had hitherto acted as men whom no opposition could resist, began to imagine that the whole Austrian army would be made prisoners, and the dominions of the empress queen of Hungary be divided among them. Vienna itself was in danger of being besieged; for every place lay open to their victorious arms; but a circumstance took place that gave a general turn to public affairs, and convinced his Prussian majesty that he had a weak side as well as others.

Leopold, count Daun, who had served many years in the army of the empress queen without ever rising higher than the rank of a major-general, was appointed to take upon him the command of the army. Like the Roman Fabius, he was cautious, that he never acted offensively till, in human probability, he had a prospect of succeeding; and then he prosecuted his measures with the utmost perseverance. Calm and and deliberate; he viewed victory as uncertain; and on every occasion, took care to secure a retreat. He did not, like some generals, despise the enemy he had to engage with; but knowing that the most trifling circumstance was able to turn the fortune of the day, he resolved never to enter upon any thing with rashness, but rather to preserve his army for a more proper opportunity, when an ungarded moment might secure victory, save the territories of his sovereign, and disappoint all the schemes formed by those who were flushed with hopes, in consequence of recent successes.

Such were the qualities of this brave general; whom the Austrian ministry pitched upon as the most proper person to retrieve their losses, and save the army, which was then in the utmost distress in the city of Prague. He collected together the fugitives that had run away after the late battle, and having received fresh supplies, he formed a camp at Rolin, near Prague. A communication was opened with that city, so that the garrison was daily supplied with provisions. This was a most gallant stroke to the king of Prussia, who was tired out with the continuance of the siege, and therefore resolved to attack count Daun in his camp, where he was strongly entrenched. This was one of the most imprudent actions that could have been committed; and marshal Keith, who saw what would be the consequence thereof, remonstrated to the king against it. He told him, that no measure was so proper as that of carrying on the siege, and waiting for count Daun, who, if he presumed to attack the Prussian army in their lines, would undoubtedly be defeated; whereas, on the other hand, an attempt upon him in his camp would be attended with two dangers, namely, a defeat, and an opportunity for the Austrian army to escape out of Prague. But nothing could prevail with the king; he looked on his troops as invincible; and in consequence thereof, on the thirteenth of June, he left his camp before Prague, and joined the prince of Bevern, who had advanced to a place called Milkowitz.

The Austrians under count Daun, were encamped in the most advantageous manner, on three rising grounds, so that it seemed almost impossible to dislodge them; but the Prussian monarch, relying on the courage and valour of his troops, began the attack about three in the afternoon, and by the most invincible courage, they made themselves masters of two of the rising grounds. The third encampment, however, baffled all their attempts; and it being utterly impracticable to bring up the horse, they were obliged to give way, which threw the king into the most violent passions, especially when he recollected that he had acted contrary to the opinion of marshal Keith.

Great numbers of men were killed on both sides, and the Prussian monarch was obliged to raise the siege of Prague, and retreat in the best manner he could. The Austrians attempted to harass him, but his men behaved with such bravery, that they lost but few of their numbers; and count Daun entered the city of Prague in triumph. The Prussian monarch was so sensible of his error, that in a letter to marshal Keith, he took the whole blame upon himself, and declared that no troops could ever have acted with greater bravery than the Austrians.

Nothing, however, could damp his spirits, his usual bravery gave life to all his actions; and altho' guilty of an error very common in war, he resolved to profit by mistakes, and rise superior to misfortune. He was surrounded by enemies on every side, his resources for carrying on the war were to be drawn from his own dominions, which were then on the point of being invaded by the Russians; but he resolved to act with more prudence for the future, and make caution a concomitant of courage.

The king of Great Britain was so equitable in all his proceedings, that although obliged to defend Hanover, yet left he should give the least offence to any of the German princes, he ordered a manifesto to be published, wherein was pointed out the designs of the French, and the necessity his majesty was under to protect his electoral dominions. As soon as this manifesto was published, the duke of Cumberland assembled the army of observation, and marching from Hanover, crossed the Weser near Retburg, which he took from the French, and there established his head quarters.

His royal highness had disposed of his troops in the most admirable manner; for they stretched out in one line of different detachments, under the command of the most experienced generals; but they had not been long at Retburg, when the duke learned that the French army was marching from the Lower Rhine, and that their design was to cut off his communication with the Weser. The French, whose numbers were double to that of the allies, continued marching forward, and his royal highness was obliged to repass the Weser, as he had not strength sufficient to venture on an engagement. The river Weser is on each side surrounded with high banks, and certain it is, that the duke, notwithstanding the inferiority of the numbers, might have made a violent opposition to the French, and disputed their passage inch by inch; but instead of that, they were suffered to cross on temporary bridges without the loss of a single man. They then seized the important pass of Stadt Oldendorf, which opened a passage into Hanover, and that electorate was laid under very heavy contributions.

On the evening of the fourth of July, the duke ordered in all his detached parties, and drew up in order of battle, but the soldiers were obliged to rest all night on their arms. About five next morning, the French cannon began to play upon that wing of the army that was composed of Hessians; and altho' they were cut down in whole ranks, yet they continued firm and immovable. About eight in the morning the small arms began to fire, and certain it is, the allied army behaved with as much bravery as ever was displayed in a field of battle, for they were not so much as put into the least disorder.

The only fault committed by the allies was the suffering the grenadiers, who composed the center, and were drawn up in a wood, to desile off in order to strengthen the right wing; for by that movement the French were enabled to penetrate so far, that one of the Hanoverian batteries fell into their hands. The hereditary prince of Brunswick behaved, on this occasion, with the most singular bravery; for putting himself at the head of a body of grenadiers, retook the battery with their bayonets fixed, although the French party, whom they drove from it, were double their number.

The French, however, were in possession of two rising grounds, on which they had erected strong batteries; and as it would have been next to impossible to have taken them, the duke, after doing all that could be performed by an able general, found himself under the necessity of founding a retreat. This was one of the most obstinate engagements during the whole of the last war, for it lasted full three days, and the French lost four times as many men as the allies, while the retreat made by the latter was so well conducted, that the enemy were afraid to pursue.

The allied army marched to Nienburg, where they encamped; while the French took Hameln, and demolished the fortifications. The duke de Richlieu was, by the intrigues of madame Pompadour, sent to supersede all the other French generals in Germany; and in the beginning of August he sent a detachment, under the duke de Chevereuse, to take possession of the city of Hanover. The garrison were permitted to go where they pleased, and the regency, finding it impossible to oppose superior numbers, ordered the citizens to remain quiet till such time as things should happen to take a different turn.

The duke of Cumberland continued retreating towards the dutchy of Verden, and from thence to Stade, where the most valuable of the records had been deposited; and on the glacis of that city he formed a camp. His royal highness drew up his lines in the best manner consistent with the situation of the ground: but the greatest abilities are of little, or, indeed, no service, when opposed by such numbers as the French army under the duke de Richlieu consisted of.

The allies, under the duke, now found themselves almost inclosed by the enemy, and under an absolute necessity of either being compelled to surrender prisoners of war, or fight with unequal numbers, under every disadvantage. In this distressed situation, the king of Denmark interposed as a mediator, and a convention was signed by the generals on both sides, in consequence of which, no less than forty thousand Hanoverians, Hessians, &c. were obliged to lay down their arms, and go into quarters of cantonment. This treaty was signed at a place called Closter Seven, and gave great offence to his late majesty; for by it the dominions of his Prussian majesty were left exposed to the French, who would not neglect to avail themselves of such a circumstance. A declaration was published at London on the sixteenth of September, wherein his majesty disclaimed all knowledge of any thing relating to the convention at Closter Seven, and that he had not given the duke power to conclude it; so that he would still act in concert with the king of Prussia.

Whatever the impartial reader may think, must be left to himself; yet surely the duke of Cumberland had not force sufficient to oppose the French; and undoubtedly, had he engaged, he would have been defeated. On the other hand, in consequence of the convention, the king of Prussia's territories were exposed to the French, who penetrated into them, and committed the most horrid barbarities; exacting contributions of a most exorbitant nature, and putting those exactions in force by military execution.

In the mean time, the Russians, who had entered Ducal Prussia, continued their march, under the generals Apraxin and Fermor, and spread such desolation wherever they came, as had seldom happened since the Roman empire was over-run by the Goths and Vandals. Pomerania, especially that part of it belonging to the king of Prussia, was ravaged and depopulated by the Swedes. Count Daun had penetrated into Silesia: the French, under the prince de Soubise, were advancing towards Saxony; and the whole dominions of the king of Prussia were given up for lost. But nothing could discourage that prince, nor damp the bravery of his spirits. The barbarities committed by the Russians were such, that the king of Prussia resolved to attack them first, and this brought on a general engagement on the thirtieth of August. The Russians, on this occasion, behaved with great intrepidity; whole ranks, and even lines, were cut down: but notwithstanding, they knew not what it was to retreat. The victory was disputed by both, but the loss of men was greatest on the part of the Russians.

Rising superior to every misfortune, and soaring above impending danger, his Prussian majesty having left some men to guard the passes which lead towards Bohemia, marched in order to meet the combined armies of France and the Empire, under the princes de Soubise and Saxe-Hilburghausen, and came up with them at Rosbach on the morning of the fifth of November, when the Prussians obtained a complete victory, with the loss of only a few men. An orator, speaking of the conduct of the Prussians on this memorable day, has the following words: "Religion marched in the van with indignant look; Liberty flew along the ranks, and enflamed the zeal of the warriors; while the omnipotent Jehovah thundered through the embattled squadrons, and their enemies lay vanquished at their feet." Here the king of Prussia, and all his army, behaved with such courage, and made the dispositions with such prudence, that the enemy were cut off in vast numbers, and the greatest part of their baggage and ammunition was taken, besides many prisoners.

On the twelfth of November, the king set out to assist the prince of Bevern, who was then in Silesia; and in his way thither, a party of four thousand soldiers, who had been prisoners among the Austrians, and had made their escape, joined him; and meeting with several parties of hussars and croats, they dispersed them, and seized the provisions they were escorting to the army.

At last the king came up with the Austrian army near Schweidnitz, and a most bloody battle ensued, in which the Prussians obtained a complete victory, though dearly bought. The Austrians, after doing every thing that brave men could perform, were obliged to retreat, and take shelter under the walls of Breslaw, which had lately fallen into their hands.

Future ages will read with admiration an account of a prince defeating a large army on the fifth of November, and on the fifth of December repeating the same, though great part of his army was composed of young recruits, who had never before seen an engagement. The king immediately pursued the Austrians, and undertook the siege of Breslaw, which surrendered in a few days, and thirteen thousand men were made prisoners of war. The military chest, containing the ammunition, was taken at the same time; and the king, in compassion to his army, who had performed wonders, ordered them into quarters of cantonment during the rest of the winter.

In the mean time, the Hanoverians, who had been confined from action by a treaty of neutrality, were so cruelly oppressed by the French, that they resolved to shake off the yoke of slavery; and the king of Britain sent a commission to prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, to put himself at the head of the army in that electorate. Hostilities being thus commenced, the French, by order of the duke de Richlieu, committed greater cruelties than ever in Hanover; and the empress-queen ordered a manifesto to be published, complaining of the conduct of the court of London, in having violated the treaty of Closter-Seven. This, however, was not regarded; and that haughty woman, whose mind boiled with resentment, ordered the two towns of Ostend and Newport to be put into the hands of the French, in order to distress the trade of England. All these measures were countenanced by the Dutch, who acted as the most mercenary wretches, being hireling to all parties, without ever taking the least part in the war.

With respect to the naval transactions during this year, the English cruisers and privateers made several captures: but although they distressed the enemy, yet they acquired but little advantage to themselves. In the West-Indies, captain Forrest, in the Augusta, accompanied by some other ships, cruized off the bay of Cape François, although a large squadron of French men of war were lying at the same place. The French admiral not knowing how to justify his conduct if he remained inactive, resolved to attack the English, and, for that purpose, sailed out of the harbour. Captain Forrest, who watched all his motions, no sooner saw him hoist his sails, than he prepared to meet him, and shortened sail, in order to give the enemy time to come up. About noon the French fleet, consisting of four ships of the line and three frigates, formed into one line; and the English captain ordered the Dreadnought and the Edinburgh to attack them. The engagement began with great fury, but the bravery of the English bore down all opposition; and towards the evening, the French were obliged to retreat with considerable loss.

The English, who could not, consistent with their own safety, pursue the enemy, kept all night under sail in the bay; and next morning seized a large fleet of French merchant ships, which were carried into Jamaica, and there sold as legal prizes.

On the first of December, the parliament met; and his majesty, in his speech, informed them, that although things had turned out contrary to his expectations and the justice of his cause, yet he was determined in his own mind to prosecute the war with vigour, for which purpose he depended on divine providence and the assistance of his faithful commons. He expatiated largely on the late successes which the king of Prussia had obtained over his enemies in Germany; and took notice to the commons, that the eyes of all Europe were turned towards them, as the persons who, in all human probability, were most likely to establish the public tranquillity. He concluded by recommending to them the necessity they were under to support the king of Prussia, whose victories in Germany would weaken the power of the French; and the most dutiful and loyal addresses were presented.

A. D. 1758. As soon as the holidays were over, the commons took into consideration the state of the kingdom in general; and made several laws, laying a tax on some branches of luxury, particularly on silver plate, which was charged sixpence each ounce. Several licences were obliged to be taken out for vending such things as seemed not, in their own nature, necessary: and, upon the whole, the commons granted the supplies in the most liberal manner.

The regular payment of wages due to seamen was, during this session, established into a law, which has been of infinite service to that useful body of men: and the laws relating to the militia being found defective, a new bill was brought in, by which they were explained and amended.

On the twentieth of June, after several acts had passed, and every thing been done for the security of the nation, the parliament was prorogued by commission; and the commons were given to understand, that their conduct, during the whole of the session, had given his majesty the utmost satisfaction.

The subjects of Great-Britain were unanimous in applauding the conduct of Mr. Pitt, who had the principal share in the management of public business; and it must be acknowledged, that no minister ever acted with greater courage, wisdom, or perseverance. He was a true judge of merit under every character, and in every station; and such accomplished men were made choice of by him to command the army and the navy, that the British glory rose to the highest pitch of grandeur. Such was the internal state of Britain at the close of this session of parliament; so that, consistent with the order of things, we must take a view of what was transacting on the continent.

The king of Prussia had made such excellent use of the successes that had attended his arms during the remainder of the last year, that the Russians were obliged to disperse themselves in Poland for want of subsistence; and the Swedes, who had over-run Pomerania, were so much harassed by the Prussian soldiers, who drove them from one place to another, that they were obliged to take shelter in Stralsund. The Austrians, who had been driven out of Silesia, took refuge in Bohemia; and although the Prussian monarch had armies, to the amount of three hundred thousand men, to contend with, yet the same magnanimity which had distinguished every part of his conduct, shone now more conspicuous than ever. The French were meditating schemes for annexing Hanover to their own dominions; and the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who had no reason to expect any favours from such perfidious enemies, yet entered into a treaty with Lewis XV. wherein he promised to withdraw his troops from assisting the Hanoverians, and employ them in the service of France. This was one of the most ungrateful proposals that, perhaps, ever had been made; and it conveys to us a very mean idea of the fidelity of German princes. The landgrave had been long supported by the English; he had entered into a treaty of the most solemn nature with our sovereign; but here, like a mean, mercenary wretch, he recedes from all his engagements, and turns his back upon his most generous benefactor. Nor was it much better with the duke of Brunswick, who, although under many obligations to us, promised to act in concert with the French; but all his schemes were defeated by the conduct of his brother prince Ferdinand, who commanded the allied army; and that of his son, the hereditary prince, who acted under his uncle.

The French, who had made themselves masters of Bremen, and some other places belonging to the German empire, were soon driven from them by a detachment under the prince of Holstein Gottorp; while the duke de Richieu, who had behaved in the most cruel manner to the Hanoverians, was superseded, and the command of the army given to the count de Clermont. This new general, as soon as he had reviewed the army, found it in a most wretched condition, in consequence of the relaxation of discipline, the severity of the season, and the almost total want of all the common necessaries of life. He knew, that, under such circumstances, it would be an act of madness to attempt any thing against prince Ferdinand; and therefore thought it most prudent to retreat towards the Rhine, while the hereditary prince of Brunswick harassed his rear, and seized the greatest part of the baggage.

The duke de Randau, the French governor at Hanover, who had done every thing to restrain the licentiousness of the soldiers, and in all things discharged his duty as a man of honour and humanity, ordered all the magazine of provisions to be distributed among the poor; and, upon the whole, left behind him such an amiable character, as shines far more conspicuous than all the blandishments of military honours.

The prince of Brunswick made every disposition that could be thought of for dislodging the French from such places as they were still in possession of in the electorate of Hanover; and the garrison of Hoya, a strong town on the Weser, was taken, and all the military stores fell into the hands of the allies. Minden was taken at the same time, and the French now found that they were losing ground every day.

The count de Clermont having crossed the Rhine, cantoned his forces along the banks of that river; while prince Ferdinand of Brunswick took possession of Munster, from whence his detached parties issued with such rapidity, that they beat up the quarters of the French, and drove them from all their advanced posts. This was shocking news to the haughty French king, whose armies had been hitherto conducted by men raised to office through the intrigues of his mistress; but now it was found necessary to change both men and measures. The duke de Belleisle was placed at the head of the war department; and, like a real lover of his country, he boldly represented to his sovereign, that the conduct of his generals in Germany had been so inconsistent with the duty they owed to the public, that they deserved the highest censures. He, at the same time, sent letters to the colonels of regiments, commanding them, in his majesty's name, not to expose any commissions to sale, but to bestow them according to merit and seniority, because such only are qualified to serve in the army, and conduct the business of war, who have acquired knowledge by experience.

On the twenty-third of June, both armies met at a place called Crevelt, and a most obstinate engagement ensued, when the French were obliged to give way, but their retreat was covered by their dragoons, who behaved with the greatest courage imaginable. This victory, which cost the allies many of their best forces, was yet far from being decisive: for although several towns surrendered to them, among which was the city of Dusseldorp, yet the enemy took refuge under the walls of Cologne; and just about the same time, the marshal de Contades was sent to take upon him the command of the French army. Prince Ferdinand had proposed, in a council of war, to make an irruption into the Netherlands, and so draw the French out of Germany, that they might not have an opportunity of disturbing the king of Prussia, while their own territories were in danger of being invaded. General Imhoff, a Hanoverian officer, attacked a party of the enemy, and drove them from a wood; but the prince de Soubise had made himself master of the important town of Gottingen, by which prince Ferdinand, whose army had suffered much by the overflowing of the Rhine, was in danger of having his forces divided. Prince Xaverius was sent with a body of forces to assist the prince de Soubise, while prince Ferdinand, who was perfectly acquainted with the country, dispatched general Oberg, with ten thousand men, to join a detachment of Hessians who were on their march to assist the allied army; for the French had acted in such an insincere manner with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, that he had determined not to have any farther connections with them. Both armies continued on the defensive, as if their sole intention had been to watch the motions of each other; but on the tenth of October, about four in the afternoon, a severe cannonading began; and notwithstanding the allies, for some time, seemed to gain the advantage, yet they were at last obliged to give way, but retreated in good order. General Oberg lost his magazine of provision and ammunition; but prince Ferdinand having been joined by a body of British troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, who died soon after, the French reaped but little benefit from the victory.

In the beginning of this year the king of Prussia besieged the town of Schweidnitz, and carried on the attack with such vigour, that the garrison was obliged to surrender prisoners of war. He likewise detached a strong party who took the town of Trawentaw, by which a passage was opened for his troops to march into Bohemia or Moldavia. Accordingly, he marched to the city of Olmutz, the capital of the latter, in which was a strong garrison; but the king besieged it in form.

Count Daun, who knew the importance of the place, marched to its relief; and meeting with a large convoy of provisions, he seized the whole, by which the king of Prussia was obliged to raise the siege. His superior knowledge and presence of mind enabled him to make an exceeding good retreat; and although count Daun watched all his motions, yet he was afraid to attack him; and marshal Keith brought off all the heavy artillery. The Austrian detached parties gave way as fast as he approached, one of them was surrounded and taken; and the king, who seemed to rise superior to misfortune, resolved to transfer the seat of war to Bohemia.

The empress of Russia entered into a new confederacy with the courts of Vienna and Versailles, and in consequence thereof her army was ordered to take the field, under the generals Fermor and Brown. Koningberg, the capital of Prussia, was taken without any resistance; and the Cossacks and Calmacks, a set of inhuman barbarians who followed the army, ravaged the neighbouring country, murdering the people without distinction of age or sex.

The Prussian general Dohna, watched their motions; but no sooner had the king heard that they were approaching towards the frontiers of Silesia, than he began his march from Bohemia, in order to give them battle. The Russians had now advanced to the neighbourhood of Frankfort; and on the ninth of August the king arrived at Landshut, where he crossed the Oder, and next day the army were allowed to rest. The Prussian monarch resolved to attack them immediately, and for that purpose marched past their left flank, and drew up his army in order of battle in an extended plain, for the Russians were in possession of the rising grounds.

This brought on a most bloody engagement, in which above twenty thousand Russians were killed, till at last night parted them, and the Prussians continued under arms. Next morning the battle began afresh; for the Russians were so numerous that they remained in an immoveable state, notwithstanding their loss. The victory was claimed by both sides, although neither had obtained one; but both behaved with the most undaunted courage. Befet, as the king was, with enemies on every side, he still continued to act with vigour; and finding that count Daun intended to attack his brother, prince Henry, he marched to his assistance with twenty-four battalions, and arrived at Torgau on the fifth of September. Several skirmishes happened between the advanced parties on both sides; and the king, whose army had been much weakened, was obliged to remain on the defensive. Count Daun, who always acted in the most cautious manner, found that the Prussians had neglected to fortify the village of Hochkirchin, he began his march in the middle of the night of the fourteenth of October, and attacked that wing of the Prussian army which was under the command of marshal Keith.

This was an unexpected stroke, and although the Prussians did every thing in their power to repair the loss, yet they were, after a most obstinate engagement, forced to give way; and the brave marshal Keith, with prince Francis of Brunswick, were killed, and the prince of Anhalt taken prisoner. The king lost above three thousand men; but he retreated in good order, and continued ten days endeavouring to bring the count to a fresh engagement. Of all the generals during the war count Daun seems to have been the most properly qualified for making use of detached parties, and harassing an enemy in a retreat. Whenever he found that the king had decamped, he was sure to harass his rear.

Prince Henry of Prussia was reduced to great straits in Saxony, while the marshal Laudohn was sent to harass the king in Lusatia. Dresden was the great object the Austrians had in view, because in consequence of its being taken from the Prussians an opening would be made into Brandenburg. This they knew would distress the king more than any thing they could undertake; but it was not to be executed so easily as they imagined.

Count Schmettau, who commanded in Dresden, declared that if the Austrians should attack the city, he would reduce the whole to a heap of ashes; and although the magistrates begged on their knees that he would desist from such a measure, yet he remained inflexible, and actually laid combustibles into the houses. He began with the suburbs, where most of the Saxon nobility and gentry resided, and in a few hours the whole was in one continued blaze. Count Daun beheld, with astonishment, the conflagration, and being afraid that the general would serve the interior part of the city in the same manner, he desisted, in some measure; while the king of Prussia relieved the town of Neiss, and then resolved to return to Saxony. This obliged count Daun to retire towards Bohemia; and the Russians, who had penetrated into Prussian Pomerania, in order to besiege some fort that would afford them winter quarters, were obliged to return to Poland. They did not, however, fail to ruin Ducal Prussia, where they robbed and murdered the inhabitants in the most horrid manner, so that the whole country was a scene of blood and misery.

The British navy during the whole course of this year, had been very successful both in America and Europe. Captain Forrest, with the captains Langdon and Suckling, attacked a French squadron at Cape François, and disabled several of them; after which he proceeded to the bay of Hispaniola, and in his way thither took a squadron of nine ships, all richly laden, which greatly distressed the French, and brought a considerable sum of money into the nation. Admiral Boscawen sailed from Portsmouth in the month of February for the North American seas, and Sir Edward Hawke was sent to the bay of Biscay. On the coast of Spain, admiral Osborn, assisted by captain Gardiner, a brave officer, attacked a French fleet of the largest ships of war, and took two of the largest belonging to their whole navy. Sir Edward Hawke intercepted a large fleet laden with stores and provisions for North America; and in a few days after, he took a fleet of their merchant ships, by which their commerce was greatly distressed. These successes were of so rapid a nature, that the people began to look upon their naval officers as the ornaments of their country, and to place the utmost confidence in them.

On the sixth of June a descent was made on the coast of France by the duke of Marlborough, who commanded the land forces, and he was supported by commodore Howe; who, with the great guns on board his squadron, kept the French in continual fear. The duke, having destroyed the shipping at St. Servan, was informed that the enemy were marching to cut off his retreat, was obliged to re-embark the forces, and then the fleet sailed towards Havre-de-grace, in order to make a second attempt to land; but the wind blowing from the shore, obliged them to sail towards Cherbourg, where the duke attempted to land the forces, but still the wind was against them, so that they were once more obliged to stand out for sea, till a more favourable opportunity should offer. On the second of August the fleet weighed anchor a second time, and set sail for France, under the command of general Bligh and commodore Howe; having on board his royal highness prince Edward, afterwards duke of York, who went as a volunteer, it being the design of his royal grandfather to bring him up in the knowledge of naval affairs.

The French, who had been so often alarmed during this summer by the appearance of our fleets on their coasts, had thrown up an entrenchment on the land side of Cherbourg; but the British forces landed without much opposition. The fire of our bomb-ketches silenced a small battery which the enemy had erected, while the grenadiers, with the other forces, were enabled to march from the landing-place up to the town; but in their way thither, they were met by a party of the enemy, who attempted to oppose them. This, however, they were not able to do, for the English guards drove them up a hill, where they remained till night, and then made their escape. A camp was then formed at the village of Erville near Cherbourg, and the next morning the general, finding that the enemy had fled, marched into the important town of Cherbourg without the least opposition; for the magistrates had ordered the gates to be set open. A manifesto was ordered to be stuck up in every public place, promising protection to all those who should not be found in arms; and the people in general behaved with great decency to the soldiers; who, in return, used them much better than in common on such occasions.

The French had laid out great sums of money in making a basin for the shipping; and although not finished, was looked upon as one of the greatest curiosities in Europe, and would have been of the utmost importance to the French navy. This basin the general caused to be destroyed; and while the engineers were employed in blowing it up, the light horse scoured the adjacent country to the distance of four miles, where they found that the enemy were daily increasing in numbers. Some of the advanced parties continued to skirmish with each other, but few of our men were killed, only that captain Lindsay, a brave young officer, was mortally wounded, and died soon after. All the stores in the town were put on board our fleet, three thousand pounds in money was exacted of the inhabitants, and the general ordered that the troops should be re-embarked; having first thrown up a trench to defend such as embarked last, in case they should be attacked by the enemy. The fleet returned to the coast of England, and again set sail for the coast of France, where they took above twenty ships, and destroyed such batteries and magazines as they found erected along the shore.

St. Malo, a strong town on the French shore, and extremely popular, was next attacked, on one side by our troops, and from the sea by our ships of war;

but the weather proving tempestuous, they were obliged to desist, and come to an anchor in St. Cas bay. There the general landed his troops, in order to spread an alarm among the people; that the French king might be obliged to recal his forces from Germany. Undoubtedly the scheme was well planned; but the events of war are uncertain. A camp had been marked out by captain Clarke, the quartermaster general; but on the eighth of September the army began to march, and in the evening halted near the river Equernon.

In the mean time the enemy, who had posted some regulars and militia on the opposite banks of the river, were so much intimidated that they retreated; and the British army having crossed the river, continued their march to Martignon, a small village, where they discovered a detached body of the enemy, who retired and spread the alarm among the people. One small party attempted to harass the flank of our army, but finding it impracticable, they made a signal to surrender; but the British forces, mistaking their meaning, fired and killed an officer with some of the men.

The second regiment of foot guards was sent to bring up the provisions, and colonel Cunningham, the chief engineer, was ordered to secure the beach, lest there should be a necessity for a retreat. The general now learned that some regiments had left the garrison of Brest, and were marching to oppose him; as he did not know but others might be sent to assist them, he sent notice to lord Howe, who commanded the fleet, to have the transports ready for the re-embarkation of the troops.

The army, consisting of six thousand five hundred men, began to march on the eleventh, in one column, and were drawn up in such a manner as to be able to attack the enemy on any side. But after two-thirds of the army was embarked, the enemy's horse appeared in sight, on a rising ground; and about noon they were joined by a large body of foot, collected from different garrisons. The English vessels fired upon them; while the French erected a battery, which they played with such fury upon the remainder of the troops that were embarking, that several of them, particularly the guards, were killed.

General Drury, with twelve hundred men, drew up on the beach, near the village of St. Cas, while the enemy, to avoid the fire from our ships, marched into a hollow way that covered them; and there the English foot prepared to attack them. A proposal had been made to the general, to cover the beach with an entrenchment; but it was done in an improper place, and he discovered his error when it was too late. General Drury, who exerted himself to the utmost, drove the enemy twice back; but as they were continually receiving fresh reinforcements, he was obliged to retreat, and march towards the boats. The French batteries played upon their rear, and some of their bombs destroyed several of the boats, while the English ships could not fire, lest they should have destroyed some of our men. General Drury, with some other officers, were killed; and several were drowned in attempting to get into the boats. Commodore Howe, who had succeeded to the title of lord in consequence of the death of his brother, behaved with great bravery on this fatal occasion, for he exposed himself to the fire of the enemy, and by his example animated the private men. Notwithstanding this scheme miscarried in its execution, yet other advantages were obtained that served to counter-balance it.

One Mr. Cumming, a quaker, who had been several voyages to the coast of Africa, made himself acquainted with every thing worth notice; and being a man of great abilities and deep penetration, observed the extensive trade carried on by the French, and made himself acquainted with the Moorish king of Legibelli, whose dominions lay along the coast where the greatest part of the trade was carried on. Gum Senega, an article much used in the manufactures of of Great Britain, had been many years wholly engrossed by the French; who sold it to the Dutch, and they to us, at a most exorbitant price. But this was not all; for Mr. Cumming took notice that many other valuable articles and branches of trade were carried on, such as elephants teeth, gold dust, cotton, ambergrease, and several others, all of which were of the utmost importance to Great Britain, and might, if conducted with spirit, become a real national good.

Mr. Cumming lost no time in making himself acquainted with every thing worthy of notice, and ingratiated himself so far into the good graces of the prince, that he made him a friend to the English, and promised him great advantages in consequence of trading with them. But what contributed most towards promoting the design, was the conduct of the French, who had exasperated the prince against them; and he was extremely desirous to have them driven from the river Senegal, where most of their territories had been established. He desired that the king of Great Britain would send a few ships of war for that purpose; promising, at the same time, to assist them with what land forces he could raise.

The difficulties that Mr. Cumming had to engage with were great indeed; but the love he had for his country, made every thing seem trifling. The ministry considered the whole as a Don Quixote like scheme, that would be attended with great loss without any solid advantages arising from it; but Mr. Cumming represented the practicability and utility of it in such strong colours, that they granted a small squadron of ships under the command of captain Marsh, with five companies of marines under the command of major Mason, and a small number of artillery, under the direction of captain Walker; but Mr. Cumming was to superintend the whole.

This small armament sailed from Portsmouth in March, and put into the Island of Teneriffe, in order to procure fresh water. There the squadron remained till Mr. Cumming sailed in the Swan sloop to Portenderrick, with a letter to the prince written in the Arabic language. In this letter, to which the king of Great Britain had put his seal, Mr. Cumming was appointed to act as ambassador, and conduct the whole of the British trade that should be carried on in that country. Upon his arrival, he found the prince of the place engaged in war with one of the neighbouring nations, and that he was then at a very great distance. But Amir, the prince's minister, sent word to his sovereign that Mr. Cumming was arrived, and that he could raise three hundred men to assist him, upon condition of their being properly reinforced from the chief army. This would have disconcerted persons of less fortitude than Mr. Cumming; but the greater the difficulties he had to encounter with, the more active was he in endeavouring to surmount them. Having sent notice to captain Marsh to proceed on his voyage, that brave officer weighed anchor, and got to the mouth of the river Senegal, where he learned that the Indian forces promised him were not so much as raised. Next day he took a large Dutch ship laden with gum, and the captain told him, that the French had erected several batteries along the side of the river, and that they were determined to dispute the passage with the English. This, however, no way intimidated the captain; who made the proper preparations for landing, although the enemy kept firing upon them. This brought on a general engagement, which lasted several hours; and two of the English transports running aground, the marines got on shore, where they were joined by those who had landed before them. They threw up an intrenchment to protect them from the fire of the enemy, till such time as they could get the stores landed.

Next day two deputies from the French governor arrived, and offered terms of capitulation; upon which it was agreed, that all the Europeans belonging to the French should be safely conducted to France in an English vessel, and that none of their private property should be taken from them: that every thing of a public nature should be delivered up to the English; and that the inhabitants, who chused to remain in Fort Louis, should be under the protection of the English government.

These terms being agreed on, captain Walker and captain Campbell were sent up the river to take possession of the forts; but when they came to the first place appointed for their landing, the enemy neither took notice of them, nor hung out the flag of truce. This surprized them much; and as they did not know what their intention might be, they sailed back to the squadron, and then went on shore to their entrenchments. There they were informed that the negroes were in arms at Fort Louis, because they had not been included in the treaty, and the governor refused to abide by the capitulation, unless the director-general of the French factory should be permitted to remain, to see that every thing was executed according to agreement. This request was immediately complied with, and then the fort was delivered up to major Mason, who found in it great quantities of merchandise, besides provisions and military stores. The inhabitants of the place cheerfully swore allegiance to the king of Britain. The prince Legibelli sent an ambassador from his camp to congratulate Mr. Cumming on his success, and all the neighbouring princes entered into treaties with him. In the whole of this important expedition, the English did not lose a single man, and, by prudence and courage, obtained possession of a very valuable place.

Mr. Cumming knew that the valuable settlement at Fort Louis could not be maintained by the English, unless they were in possession of Goree, about one hundred miles distant, where the French had large magazines, and where they kept all their slaves before they sent them to the West-Indies. An attempt was made upon it, but the English had not force sufficient to take it. News having been transmitted to England, commodore Keppel was sent with six ships of the line, besides frigates and transports, with seven hundred land forces on board. On the twenty-eighth of December, they came to an anchor off Goree, and next morning prepared to attack the place. The French, who had erected batteries along the shore, played briskly upon our men of war, particularly the Prince Edward, which had her main bowsprit shot away, but the Nassau made up to her assistance. The commodore, who was in the Torbay, paid the utmost attention to every thing; and so terrible was the fire from his ship, that the whole seemed one continued blaze.

Many thousands of negroes came down to see the engagement, and were filled with surprize at the bravery of the English seamen, whose courage increased with their danger. The fire from the English ships soon obliged the governor to strike the flag; and then a lieutenant, with the commodore's secretary, were sent on shore, where they were met by the governor's secretary, who asked them what terms the commodore was willing to grant. This surprized them, because they imagined that the garrison were ready to surrender prisoners of war; and then they asked him, whether the flag was not struck? He answered, that it was not, but only for a parley; upon which they parted in disgust. The engagement was begun again with greater fury than ever; but in less than an hour, the governor, as a signal to surrender, dropped the flag and the regimental colours, and then a party of marines took possession of the island.

Things of great importance were, at this time, carrying on in America. In May, general Amherst, with a body of troops, and general Boscawen, sailed from Halifax in Nova Scotia; and on the second of June, landed about seven miles west of Louisbourg, in the island of Cape Breton. The French had taken great care to fortify the place in the strongest manner, and the mouth of the harbour had batteries erected at it. The garrison was numerous, and a chain of forts had been erected along the coast, where it was expected the English would land.

General Wolfe, the second in command, in order to give them an example to imitate, leaped into the water, and got first on shore. He then attacked, and drove the French from one of their batteries: upon which Mr. Drucour ordered in his detached parties, and prepared to make the most vigorous defence. The English land forces, under the command of general Wolfe, took possession of that part of the harbour, near its entrance, called the Light-house Point; while the admiral set fire to some ships in the harbour, and burnt two of them to the water-edge. The enemy had only two ships of the line and a frigate now remaining, and these were taken in a few days; so that the harbour being thus laid open, the siege was begun, and carried on in the most regular manner. It was impossible for the governor to hold out against the combined force of the army and navy; so that he resolved to capitulate, and the whole garrison were made prisoners of war. The whole loss of the English amounted to about four hundred; and thus, by the utmost efforts of courage, the whole island of Cape Breton became subject to the English. In Louisbourg our army found a vast quantity of military stores; and such of the inhabitants as did not chuse to live under the English government, were sent over to France, but the prisoners were transported to England. The island of St. John, in the gulph of St. Laurence, was taken, about the same time, by lord Rollo, and in the governor's house were found several scalps of Englishmen who had been murdered by the Indians.

It is impossible to express the joy that filled the nation upon the arrival of the news of this important event: it gave inexpressible pleasure to all ranks of people; and eleven pair of French colours that had been taken were brought to his majesty at Kensington, who ordered them to be escorted, under a strong guard, to the cathedral of St. Paul, where they were hung up as trophies of the victory.

Captain Tyrrel, in the Buckingham man of war, was sent to protect our commerce in the West-Indies; and in the bay of Martinico he demolished a French fort, with several merchant ships that had on board very valuable cargoes, and a considerable number of privateers. Captain Tyrrel was seldom disengaged from action, and few men in his station ever acquired greater honour. Happening to fall in with the Weasel sloop of war, commanded by lieutenant Bowles, between Montserrat and Guadalupe, they discovered a fleet of nineteen vessels, under the convoy of a man of war named the Florissant, and two large frigates. But, notwithstanding superiority of numbers, Tyrrel, who was a stranger to fear, immediately hoisted sail, and gave chase. The two frigates were soon rendered unfit for action: upon which captain Tyrrel attacked the man of war, and poured a whole broadside into her. A most desperate and bloody engagement ensued, in which captain Tyrrel lost three of his fingers, and was otherwise so much wounded, that he was obliged to give up the command to Mr. Marshal, his first lieutenant, who fought bravely till he was killed; and then the command devolved upon the second lieutenant, who fought so desperately, that the Florissant was obliged to strike; but the sea running high before the Buckingham could board her, she again hoisted her colours, and made her escape. This was reckoned one of the most glorious actions during the war, and will ever redound to the honour of Tyrrel, who lost only twenty men, while the French lost one hundred and eighty, besides above three hundred wounded; so that it was with the utmost difficulty that they could keep the ship above water till they got into the harbour of Martinico.

Things had not been, during this year, so successfully carried on in the East-Indies, though no blame could be thrown upon our commanders, who exerted themselves to the utmost. Admiral Pocock being joined by commodore Stephens, with several ships of the line, they set sail from the bay of Madras, in order to intercept the French fleet, which they expected to come up with near the bay of St. David's.

On the twenty-ninth of March, the admiral came up with the French fleet, consisting of nine ships of the line, and resolved to give them battle. The engagement lasted several hours; and about five in the evening, the French admiral got before the wind, and the English admiral gave the signal for a general chase; but night coming on, he was obliged to desist. In the morning the pursuit was continued; but several of the ships were so much disabled, and the wind was so much in favour of the French, that the English were obliged to come to an anchor in the bay of Madras. There he learned that one of the French ships had been so much damaged, that they had been obliged to run her a-ground; and that they had not been able to land any forces at St. David's. Three of the English captains, who had not been active enough in obeying the admiral's signals, were tried by a court-martial, and broke; for it was in consequence of their conduct that the French fleet escaped, which otherwise would have been totally destroyed.

The next object the admiral had in view was the reduction of Pondicherry: and having repaired his ships, he set sail for that place on the tenth of May. He arrived in the bay opposite to that fort on the thirtieth of May, where he got sight of the French fleet, but could not come up with them; which obliged him to return to Madras, in order to consult on the most proper methods to be used, and likewise to get a supply of fresh provisions, of which the fleet was in great want.

Having consulted with the governor, and got every thing ready, the admiral weighed anchor on the twenty-fifth of July, and in two days got sight of the French fleet, consisting of eight ships and a frigate. They were steering towards Pondicherry; and admiral Pocock made the signal for a general chase, but could not come up with them till the third of August, when a general engagement ensued. The French admiral found it impossible to resist the bravery of the English; and therefore, in a few minutes, he gave way, while the English pursued till night, when they were parted, and by that means the French got into the road of Pondicherry. In this engagement the English had a considerable number wounded, among whom were commodore Stephens and captain Martin; but they had not above forty killed.

On the fourteenth of September, colonel Draper, on board the company's ship Pitt, arrived at Madras, having under his command some companies of his own regiment: and in the beginning of December, the French forces encamped near a place called Choultry. The English cannonaded them a whole day, and next morning they seemed as if going to draw up in order of battle. Colonel Draper, with colonel Lawrence, being afraid that they might cut off their retreat, took possession of the Black Town, and the French marched up to attack it; but one of their regiments was surprised by colonel Draper, and almost cut off. Had the colonel been properly supported, he would, in all probability, have defeated the enemy; but his numbers were so small, that he was obliged to retreat.

The parliament of Great-Britain met on the twenty-third day of November, and was opened by a commission from his majesty. The lord-keeper informed them, that his majesty had ordered the lords commissioners to lay before them all papers relating to the state of the nation: that the great success which had attended his majesty's arms, both by sea and land, could not fail of reducing the enemy to such distress, that they would be ready to propose terms of peace. He added, that his good brother, the king of Prussia, had exerted himself to the utmost, altho' opposed by very numerous armies. He sincerely lamented, that the state of public affairs had laid such burthens on his people; but he doubted not that his faithful commons would consider such burthens as absolutely necessary, in order to support the dignity of the crown and the interest of the nation. He concluded by telling them, that he was so well convinced of their affection, both to his person and government, that he thought it altogether needless to use many words to persuade them, and therefore left the whole to their own discretion. No disputes arose concerning the speech, for both houses presented the most loyal addresses, and both seemed to strive which should be most forward in shewing their regard for their country.

A. D. 1759. This year opened with a proclamation, offering an additional bounty to such seamen as were willing to enter into his majesty's service; and the conduct of administration, in this instance, was followed by most of the cities and towns in the nation. All parties were reconciled, and patriotism diffused itself throughout every part of the kingdom. The ministry planned their schemes with such judgment, as will ever do honour to their superior abilities; and our forces, both by land and sea, even performed wonders. The French navy was now reduced so much, that they resolved upon making one bold push; but as their whole finances were exhausted, they were obliged to oppress the subjects in the most cruel manner. Great preparations were made by them along the coasts of Normandy and Britany; forces were collected together, and several new ships were built. There was not the least doubt but they intended to invade England, for they had provided a great number of flat bottomed boats at Havre de Grace, and some other ports. A small squadron was to be fitted out at Dunkirk, and the command given to Mr. Thurot, a person of obscure birth, but possessed of such abilities as would have done honour to the highest station in the navy. It was supposed that this squadron was intended for making a descent on Scotland; but every thing was conducted with such secrecy, that the public were left merely to conjecture. Another squadron was to make a descent on Ireland; and the whole was to be escorted by M. de Conflans, who, with the duke de Aiguillon, was then at Brest, giving the necessary orders. The English ministry, who attended to the interests of the nation with the greatest integrity, took care to be beforehand with them. A squadron, under commodore Boys, was ordered to lie opposite the harbour of Dunkirk: the fleet in Brest was blocked up by admiral Hawke; and captain Duff watched Vannes, another of their ports: so that it seemed almost impossible for them to get their ships out of their harbours.

On the second of July, admiral Rodney came to an anchor before Havre de Grace, in order to prevent the flat-bottomed boats from joining the fleet, and so frustrate the whole scheme. Next day he attacked the town with two vessels, and threw such a number of bombs into it, that most of the magazines were destroyed. The bombardment continued fifty hours without intermission, and was so dreadful that the town was three times set on fire. The flat-bottomed boats were likewise set on fire, and continued burning six hours; so that it took several hundred men to extinguish it.

The consternation of the inhabitants was greater than can be imagined, many of them forsook their dwellings, while the military continued erecting batteries, and throwing up entrenchments; for they imagined that the admiral intended to land. The conduct of the admiral on this occasion struck such terror into the French ministry, that they became divided in their councils; for they found it almost impossible that ever they could make a descent on England, while our navy did their duty.

In the mean time, the brave admiral Boscawen was sent into the Mediterranean, to block up the harbour of Toulon, where the French had a fleet under the command of M. de la Clue. Three English men of war were sent to burn two of the French ships that guarded the mouth of the harbour; but a calm coming on, the enemy took the advantage, and fired so briskly, that the English vessels were greatly damaged, and the admiral was obliged to return to Gibraltar. The French seized that opportunity of getting out of the harbour, thinking to get through the gut of Gibraltar without being seen by the English. Admiral Boscawen ordered one of his ships to cruise, and to keep a good look-out, that he might have timely notice of their arrival. Accordingly, on the seventeenth of August, the cruising vessels brought notice to the admiral, that the French fleet were steering along the coast of Barbary, seeming as if they intended to pass the gut, and so get into the ocean. The whole fleet were immediately ordered to weigh anchor, and get under sail; and next day, about two in the afternoon, they came up with the French, but it was some time longer before they could engage, because of the wind dying away. The English admiral came up with M. de la Clue, in a large French first-rate called the Ocean, about four in the afternoon, and the engagement began in the most furious manner; the French, according to their usual custom, aiming all their fire at the sails and rigging. By this method of fighting, the Namur, admiral Boscawen's ship, was so much damaged, that he was obliged to hoist his flag on board the Newark; and soon after the Ceptaur, a ship of seventy-four guns, struck to the English.

The French admiral stood in for the land, which admiral Boscawen seeing, ordered the America and Intrepid to go and destroy his ship; but the French admiral saved them the trouble: for having one of his legs broke, he got on shore, and then the ship struck. Admiral Boscawen ordered her, as she was little better than a wreck, to be set on fire; while he burnt another, and two were brought off with very little damage; so that the English obtained this important victory with the loss of only fifty-six men.

This was a most fatal blow to the French, for besides the loss of four capital ships, their two fleets were prevented from joining; but still they carried on their preparations at Brest, like broken gamesters, who, when they have borrowed a trifle, will venture all upon it. A large body of land forces, with the Irish brigades, were kept in readiness in order to embark on board the transports; and a train of artillery was to be sent along with them. Thurot had made his escape out of the harbour of Dunkirk, in order to sail round the coast of Scotland, to divide our fleet, by obliging some of them to sail that way; but all their projects were defeated by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke.

That brave admiral continued to block up the harbour of Brest, with a fleet of twenty-three ships of the line; while another squadron under the command of commodore Duff, cruised along the coast to keep the people in continual alarm, and to prevent any of their privateers putting out to sea. The French ministry were out of all patience, because of their fleet in Brest lying inactive; and therefore in the month of November, positive orders were sent to M. de Conflans to make an attempt to get out.

A great storm arising on the coast, the English fleet were driven out to sea, and on the tenth of November they came to an anchor in Torbay road. This gave the French admiral an opportunity of making out of the harbour, his design being to attack and destroy the small squadron under the command of commodore Duff, and so prevent his junction with the grand fleet. In the mean time, the weather being more favourable, Sir Edward Hawke set sail for his former station, and dispatched the Coventry and Maidstone frigates a-head of the squadron to give proper signals of the approach of the enemy. About ten in the morning of the twentieth of November the Maidstone gave the signal, upon which Sir Edward ordered all the ships to draw near and form a-breast. The enemy were just at that instant in pursuit of Duff's squadron; but seeing the English fleet, they hoisted all the sail they could, by which Duff had an opportunity of joining the admiral. Sir Edward ordered seven of the ships to give them chase; and, in the mean time, that no opportunity should be lost, he bore down upon them with the rest of the fleet, keeping all the ships formed in the line of battle.

Future ages will read, with admiration, the conduct of the English admiral on this memorable occasion. The coast was full of rocks and shallows, the wind was blowing towards the shore; he had few pilots to give him proper directions, and the enemy had a great number of land forces on board. But no fear of danger could make him neglect that duty he owed to his country; he knew that our enemies were forming schemes to make the British as abject slaves as themselves; and therefore he was determined either to conquer or perish in the attempt. The two fleets came up together near the island of Bellisle, about half an hour after two in the afternoon, and the engagement began between the van of the English and the rear of the French. The admiral in the mean time continued in pursuit of the van, and came up with the French admiral's ship into which he poured a broad-side. A large French ship named the Thesee, came up to the assistance of admiral Conflans ship the Soliel; but the Royal George, on board of which was admiral Hawke, sunk her in an instant, and every person on board perished, affording a most shocking spectacle to those who saw it.

The weather was very tempestuous, notwithstanding which the battle was carried on with great fury. The Superb, a large French ship, was sunk soon after the Thesee, and the Formidable struck her colours. The Heros, another of the French ships, submitted, and came to an anchor about four in the afternoon; but the sea continued running so high, that the boats could not get up to man her. The night coming on, the shattered remains of the French fleet made their escape, except the Soliel, in which was the admiral; but when morning came, he discovered that he had lain all night at anchor in the midst of the English, and therefore slipped his cable to make his escape. Sir Edward Hawke ordered the Effex to pursue her; but unfortunately she happened to stick on a sand bank; so that the Vengeance, Portland, and Chatham, were ordered upon the same service. The French admiral seeing no methods to be used in order to save his ship, got into what boats he had, and then set her on fire; while the English did the same to two large ships which they had driven upon the sand banks.

Seven large ships of the French squadron were still riding at anchor, which the English admiral seeing, ordered the fleet to weigh; but the weather being very tempestuous, he was a second time obliged to come to an anchor. The French, seeing nothing less than immediate destruction before them, threw overboard all their ammunition, guns, and stores, and then took shelter in the mouth of the river Vilaine, where they were protected by several batteries erected for the purpose.

This was one of the most important victories ever obtained over the French, during the whole course of the war; for it disconcerted their whole scheme laid for the invasion of England, while their navy was almost reduced to a wreck. Nor did the brave Sir Edward Hawke leave the French coast till his sovereign recalled him, in order to confer upon him such honours as his merits entitled him to.

In the mean time the English were equally successful in other parts of the globe; for in the West Indies they took the valuable island of Guadaloupe, and the whole exterior parts of Canada on the south of the river St. Laurence were also subdued.

The next great object of national importance was the reduction of the island of Martinico; and for that purpose a fleet sailed from St. Helens under the command of commodore Hughes, consisting of eight sail of the line, besides several frigates and bomb-ketches, with transports, having on board some land forces, under the command of the generals Hopson and Barrington. At Barbadoes they were joined by commodore Moore, who took upon him the command of the whole squadron; and having provided the fleet with every thing necessary for the undertaking, they set sail on the thirteenth of January. On the sixteenth of the same month the attack was made on Fort Negro, about three miles from the capital, and next day the marines landed, in order to drive the enemy from their entrenchments; but on climbing up the rock they found them all gone. Immediately, upon a signal given, a body of seamen from each ship landed, and hoisted the English flag upon the parapet; while the Woolwich, Roebuck, and Winchester, attacked a fort near the entrance of the harbour. This battery was soon silenced, and a large magazine blown up, while the three ships kept up a constant fire, in order to cover the flat-bottomed boats. The scheme of landing the marines at one part of the island, and the rest of the forces at another, was of considerable advantage; for the enemy being afraid that they should be enclosed between two fires, shut themselves up in Port Royal, the citadel, and suffered the English troops to land without opposition.

When general Hopson had advanced a few miles up the country, he found it impracticable to proceed farther, unless the commodore would send to his assistance some of the heavy artillery, and at the same time attack the fort from the bay. Accordingly he sent to acquaint the commodore, who immediately landed the heavy artillery, which were drawn up to the general by the seamen instead of horses, while the squadron came to an anchor. The general called a council of war, to enquire whether it was practicable to attack the fort of Port Royal; but the majority being of a contrary opinion, the forces were re-embarked, with a view of landing at St. Pierre; and the fleet, with the transports, set sail for that part of the island; but the attempt miscarried, though it succeeded some time after.

In North America, many of the English groaned under the most cruel oppression; for the French had in the most infamous manner, stirred up most of the Indian nations to destroy those who lived on the borders of our settlements. The barbarities committed by these savages were the most horrid that could be imagined; and compassion for the distressed induced our ministry to employ agents to enter into a treaty with the Indians. For this purpose a congress was held at Easton, near one hundred miles from Philadelphia; wherein it was agreed, that fifteen Indian nations should become the allies of Great Britain, and that they and our army should mutually defend each other.

This was one of the wisest measures that could have been thought of; for no sooner was it concluded, than the Indians agreed to go along without forces, and attack the French in such of their settlements as were not then conquered in Canada. The army, employed in this important service, was divided into three parts; the first of which, under the command of general Amherst, crossed Lake George, without meeting with any opposition.

The first place he approached was the important pass of Ticonderago; but the French abandoned it, and fled towards Canada. General Amherst ordered such parts of the fortifications as the French had destroyed, to be rebuilt, and put the place in a much better condition than ever it had been in before; and there he learned that the French had abandoned Crown Point, so that nothing but victory attended the British arms. The general sent a party of men to take possession of it, and to fortify it in the strongest manner; because, in consequence of doing so, the Indians in the French interest, would be prevented from coming down in scalping parties to commit the most horrid barbarities.

A party of French, who had not been able to keep up up with the main body, retired to an island in Lake Champlain; and as there was reason to fear that they would plunder the neighbouring inhabitants on the continent, general Amherst ordered a sloop of sixteen guns to be built, and gave the command thereof to captain Loring; but the season was so far advanced, and the weather so very tempestuous, he could not proceed on the Lake, and the general returned to Crown Point.

While general Amherst was at Crown Point he received intelligence that Sir William Johnson, who commanded a party of Indians, had been joined by general Prideaux, and that they were on their march towards Niagara. There they attacked the French fort; but general Prideaux was unfortunately killed by the bursting of a shell, while he was taking a view of the trenches. Sir William Johnson took the command upon him till the arrival of general Gage, and then the siege was carried on with great vigour. The French were so much alarmed with the apprehension of losing a fort that would open a new way for the English, that they sent a body of twelve hundred regulars, under the command of M. de Aubry, to assist those that were in the garrison.

Sir William Johnson having intelligence that they were approaching the place, resolved to give them battle; and therefore, leaving a small party to conduct the siege, he came up with them near the borders of a wood, and a desperate engagement ensued. In less than an hour, victory declared in favour of the English, and the French general, with the greatest part of his men, were killed; for the Indians, who had concealed themselves in the wood, galled them in the severest manner. Seventeen officers were taken prisoners, a list of which Sir William sent to the French governor of the fort, requesting him to surrender, as it would be in vain to attempt holding out any longer. The governor, conscious that he could not defend himself much longer, agreed to capitulate, and the articles being drawn, the garrison were suffered to march out with all the honours of war. They were then sent to Newark, in order to embark for France; and as for the women, with the sick and wounded, they were treated in the most humane and compassionate manner.

But the great object still in view by the English was the complete conquest of Canada; for although they had ravaged most of the country, yet the towns still held out for the French. It was an attempt of the most hazardous nature, but nothing seemed too difficult for our troops, who had carried conquest before them through every country where they happened to engage.

The fleet destined to execute this enterprize, sailed from Portsmouth in February under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes; but when they had got within sight of Cape Breton, they were obliged to steer away towards Halifax, the harbour being frozen over. In the mean time, admiral Durell was detached, with a small squadron, to the river St. Laurence; there to cruise, and prevent the garrison of Quebec from receiving stores.

Admiral Saunders, having taken in fresh provisions, and embarked the land forces, sailed up the river St. Laurence. The commander in chief of the forces was general Wolfe, and under him were the generals Monckton, Townsend, and Murray, young gentlemen of approved abilities, and brought up to all the hardships of a military life. About the latter end of June the forces were landed on the isle of Orleans, a little below Quebec; where the general caused a manifesto to be published, intimating, that the king of Great Britain, his sovereign, had fitted out a fleet and an army to reduce all the French settlements in North America; but that no injury should be done to the peaceable inhabitants, who should be allowed the free exercise of their religion, and to follow their secular employments.

No declaration made by one who came in an hostile manner, could be more replete with sentiments of humanity; but the Romish priests had so prepossessed the people against the English, that they looked upon our army as a body of heathens devoted to destruction. Such of the straggling parties of our forces as happened to leave the main army, were murdered by these most wretched bigots. Upon which the brave general Wolfe sent a letter to the French commander, requesting that he would issue orders to the Canadians and Indians to desist from such practices, as were contrary to the laws of war, and a disgrace to humanity. He added, that unless his request was complied with, he should find himself under the disagreeable necessity of making reprisals, and treating all those who fell into his hands in the same manner as the British subjects had been treated by the Indians. M. de Montcalm, the French general, though a brave soldier, yet having received positive orders from his court not to shew any mercy to the English, refused to return any answer to general Wolfe's letter; upon which, contrary to his natural sentiments of humanity, he was obliged, though very unwillingly, to suffer the soldiers to commit some very irregular actions.

The situation of Quebec made it easy for the French to fortify it in the strongest manner, and the garrison was well supplied with all sorts of provisions. At the same time, M. de Montcalm had under his command a large body of regulars, so that the taking of the place seemed next to impossible: but the confidence which the general had in his troops, and his martial genius, which seemed superior to every thing, induced him to begin the hazardous enterprize, bidding defiance to all dangers, for the sake of military glory, and the love of his country.

Point Levi, near Quebec, was fortified with a train of artillery; and as the taking of that place was of great importance, general Wolfe ordered general Monckton to advance towards it in the night with four battalions, and next morning it was taken. The English erected a battery upon it; upon which the French general sent a body of sixteen hundred men to dislodge them, but they fell into such confusion, that they fired on each other, while the English played off their artillery with so much success, that great part of the town was reduced to ashes.

In the mean time, the English fleet suffered considerably, in consequence of a dreadful storm, which drove the ships against each other, and several of the transports were dashed in pieces. The French general, who beheld this disaster, ordered some fire-ships to be sent in among the English transports; but the English admiral disconcerted his scheme, by ordering the seamen to board them; and then being towed to land, they were all set on fire. A second attempt of the like nature was made, but it was attended with the same consequences, for they were burnt like the others. General Wolfe found it necessary to make himself as well acquainted with the river St. Laurence as possible; and therefore colonel Charlton was ordered to land at a place called Point au Tremble, in order to make what discoveries he could, and, if possible, to bring off some prisoners, by which the designs of the enemy might be known. These orders the colonel obeyed, while general Townshend prevented the French from erecting a battery near the mouth of the river Montmorenci, where they intended to cannonade the English; and this was done by keeping up a continual fire.

The water was too shallow for the men of war to come up to the beach; but, to remedy that misfortune, the admiral ordered two transports to be got ready, and to be run on shore, by which he proposed taking the advanced redoubt. By such means as these, the forces were landed; and the grenadiers were so impatient to dislodge the French from their entrenchments, that they ran on in the most irregular manner, without minding the orders they had received. The enemy kept up such a close fire, that the grenadiers were obliged to shelter themselves under the redoubt, which had been abandoned by the French; and the general finding the night coming on, ordered them them to retreat to the camp at Montmorenci; while the admiral, who was afraid lest the two transports which had been run ashore should fall into the hands of the enemy, ordered them to be set on fire. The retreat of the grenadiers discouraged the general so much, especially as five hundred men had been killed, besides a great number of officers, that he was determined to make one bold effort; and, for that purpose, general Murray was sent to a place called Chambaud, where he burnt a large magazine of provisions and ammunition belonging to the French. The fatigues which the brave general Wolfe had lately undergone, had such an effect on his constitution, that he was forced to keep his bed for several days; and, in the mean time, desired the other generals to make the most necessary dispositions for attacking the place, that the dispute might be finally terminated. It was their opinion, that it would be best to land such of the forces as were yet on board, about three miles above the town, and so bring on the enemy to a general engagement: but this measure being found impracticable, they were landed a little below the town, in the middle of the night: for although several of them had landed before, yet they had been obliged to re-embark. General Wolfe was one of the first that set foot on shore; and the general disembarkation was covered and protected by admiral Holmes, who kept hovering on the coast while the boats glided along. They had a rising ground to ascend, called Mount Abraham, and about the middle of it was a guard of French soldiers; but colonel How, with a party of highlanders, drove them from it, and made way for the army to ascend the hill. The French general had marked out a strong camp, and actually taken possession of it; but no sooner did he learn that the English had ascended the hill, than he resolved to give them battle.

In the mean time, general Wolfe seeing that the French were approaching to attack him, ordered the line to be formed, giving the command of the right to general Monckton, and that of the left to general Murray: the center was commanded by himself; and about nine in the morning the engagement began. Soon after the first or second firings were over, general Wolfe, who was stationed in the hottest part of the battle, received a wound in his wrist; but pulling a handkerchief out of his pocket, wrapped it round his hand, and continued to advance at the head of the grenadiers, without the least emotion, as if insensible of any thing but his duty.

The French met the English grenadiers with great fury. General Wolfe, in pushing forward, received a mortal wound in his breast, and, like Epaminondas, lost his valuable life at a time when victory had declared for him. The critical moment was now arrived; for the general being killed, no time was to be lost, lest the troops should have been dispirited; and general Townshend being the next in command, hastened to the center, where he soon found that a party of two thousand French were on the point of attacking him in the rear. These, however, were afraid to advance, thinking it more prudent to retire among the woods.

The French now gave way, after above eight hundred had been killed; and M. de Montcalm finding himself mortally wounded, just before he died, wrote a letter to general Townshend, recommending to his humanity and compassion the poor prisoners and the wounded. The next in command under him shared the same fate; for being mortally wounded, he was carried on board one of our ships of war, but expired within a few hours after.

The brave general Wolfe, of whom the nation had formed the greatest hopes, expired soon after the victory. Being told of the success of his forces, he said to those who attended him, "Then (thank God) I die contented." To do justice to all ranks of people, it must be acknowledged that the loss of this brave officer was sincerely lamented. He was only in his thirty-second year, but crowned with military glory in such a manner, that his name will be transmitted to posterity with honour; while other young gentlemen in succeeding ages will be stimulated to emulate so shining a character. A noble monument has been erected for him in Westminster-abbey. But his actions will immortalize his name; when the most solid marble shall have crumbled into dust.

The generals and admirals being now in possession of every thing but the town, they thought it more prudent to accept of proposals to capitulate than to undergo the hardships of a siege; so that the garrison were suffered to march out with all the honours of war. By the articles of capitulation it was granted, that the people should enjoy the free use and exercise of the Romish religion, and all episcopal offices, in the same manner as when under the French government; till such time as the war was over; and that they should be treated in the same manner as if they had been originally subjects of Great-Britain. The English having taken possession of the gates, general Townshend gave the command of the town to general Murray, with a garrison of five thousand men; and set sail, with admiral Saunders, for Europe. General Monkton, who had been dangerously wounded in the battle, was sent to New-York, where he happily recovered.

In the East-Indies, the affairs of the English began to wear a favourable aspect: for the admirals Cornish and Pocock defeated a large squadron of men of war, and obliged them to take shelter in the island of Mauritius, to resist. The Dutch, ever selfish and mercenary, continued to supply the French with provisions; for they seldom pay the least regard to any thing besides money, the means used in procuring it being little attended to. Under pretence that our men of war had given them some affront, the Dutch governor of Batavia ordered some of our merchantmen to be seized; and captain Wilson, in the Calcutta Indiaman, having demanded satisfaction, the Dutch commodore threatened to sink him if he did not immediately retire. As captain Wilson knew that it would be very imprudent in him to engage with force so superior, he returned to Calcutta; and told colonel Clive in what manner he had been treated. There being two other East-Indiamen lying there at the same time, the colonel ordered them to attack the Dutch commodore. Accordingly a smart engagement ensued, in which two of the Dutch ships were obliged to bear away, a third was driven on shore, and four struck their flags. Colonel Coote, who had been sent in the beginning of this year from England, carried on the war with very great success on the coast of Coromandel; where he defeated general Lally, reduced several strong forts which the French had erected, and concluded the year with honour to himself, while the interest of the nation was promoted.

In Germany, the war was carried on with various success. The king of Prussia was so surrounded by enemies on all hands, that it was imagined he would be swallowed up; but perseverance enabled him to surmount every difficulty. Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, who commanded the allied army, had been considerably reinforced by fresh troops from England; and on the thirteenth of April, he came within sight of the French, commanded by marshal Broglie, at Bergen, a small village in the neighbourhood of Frankfurt. No general could have done more than prince Ferdinand in order to procure victory; but such was the situation of the French, that although he attacked them three different times, yet he was, in the end, obliged to retreat; but did it in such excellent order, that the French were not able to pursue him. This action was a severe stroke to the allied army, who were greatly distressed for want of provisions; while the French, who had taken the city of Göttingen, enjoyed them in great plenty, and were every day marching farther into the electorate of Hanover, exacting of the inhabitants heavy contributions.

It was now become, in a manner, absolutely necessary for the allies to venture on an engagement, otherwise the French would have once more made good their winter quarters in Hanover. The French general had made himself master of the city of Minden, and ordered a camp to be formed in its neighbourhood. On the other hand, prince Ferdinand, whose army lay encamped at Petershagen, acted with so much prudence, and displayed such military skill, that the French could not perceive, from his motions, whether he intended to advance or retreat.

He had received advice, that a large convoy of provisions was coming from Paderborn for the use of the French, and he designed, if possible, to prevent its joining the army. At the same time, he made as if he intended to divide his forces, and this led the French generals into a snare. The duke de Broglie marched, in order to attack general Wägenheim; but when he came to the top of an eminence, he was surprised to see the whole of prince Ferdinand's army drawn up in the order of battle.

It was now too late to think of retreating; for on one side was the river Weser, and on the other a deep morass, both strongly guarded by the allies; so that the French were in great danger of being surrounded. The engagement was begun by the French cavalry, who came upon the English infantry with great fury. Nothing could equal the courage of the English on this occasion; for although they were only assisted by a small party of the Hanoverian army, yet they cut in pieces two bodies of the French horse who had repeatedly attempted to break through them. The English regiments of Walgrave and Kingsley cut in pieces two French battalions who attempted to support the horse; upon which the center of the French army being broken, and the rest beginning to retreat, prince Ferdinand sent an express order to lord George Sackville, who commanded the English horse, to come up at full gallop; but a misunderstanding having, for some time, subsisted between the prince and lord George, the latter did not come up in time to share in the glory of the victory. Had the English cavalry come up in time, the French would have been totally routed; but, by this fatal misunderstanding, they made good their retreat in tolerable order, the English not being able to harass their rear without the assistance of the horse. As the glory of this victory was chiefly owing to the courage and bravery of the English, so the prince did not neglect to acknowledge it, and only regretted that the marquis of Granby had not commanded the horse.

Great rejoicings were made in England when the news of this important victory arrived: but the spirits of the people were damped when they considered that the conduct of their own general had prevented it from being decisive. Lord George Sackville, whose conduct exposed him to great censure, left the army, and returned to England, where he was, by his majesty's orders, stripped of all his employments, and the command of the British forces conferred on the brave marquis of Granby, a young nobleman, who, to the most extensive benevolence, joined the most undaunted courage, and was obeyed by the soldiers from motives of love rather than fear.

The French were so much incensed at their loss of this memorable battle, that the marshal de Belleisle, who was at the head of the war department, lost the whole of his reputation, while the duke de Broglie and the marshal de Contades mutually upbraided each other. Broglie, who had gone to Paris in order to vindicate his own character, took care to represent that of M. de Contades in such an odious light, that the latter was recalled, and the former invested with the chief command, partly by the intrigues of madam Pompadour, and partly by the antipathy his sovereign had conceived against him.

When Broglie returned to the camp, the season was too far advanced for action; but notwithstanding, he resolved to attack prince Ferdinand's lines, who was well prepared to receive him. In that, however, he miscarried, and was obliged to return to his camp, leaving the prince at full liberty to secure all his cantonments, while the army went into winter-quarters.

The hereditary prince of Brunswick, whose military glory was now beginning to shine in the most conspicuous light, had been detached, at the head of a party, into Saxony, in order to second the operations of the king of Prussia; and, during the time he was there, he behaved not only with courage, but also displayed such consummate knowledge as surprised all Europe.

On the fourteenth of November, both houses of parliament met at Westminster, by commission; and the lord-keeper informed the members, that his majesty had called them together in order that all public affairs should be laid before them; that their advice should be taken in every thing of importance; and that they might bestow some marks of their favour on those generals and admirals who, during the summer, had distinguished themselves with so much honour. He added, that nothing could give him greater pleasure than to see the public tranquillity restored; but that he would never make peace on terms which were dishonourable. He rejoiced to find that his beloved subjects lived in harmony under his government; and assured the commons, that although great sums of money had been granted for carrying on the war, yet none of them had been appropriated to private purposes, but the whole laid out in the uses for which they were designed. He concluded by recommending to them the general state of Europe, so far as the flames of war had been lighted; that all these nations had their eyes fixed upon them; and that he doubted not but they would contribute in the most liberal manner towards supporting the army and navy. Dutiful and loyal addresses were presented by both houses, and a perfect union took place between the ministry and the parliament.

Two of the royal family of Great-Britain died towards the close of this year. The princess of Orange, eldest daughter to his majesty king George II. died at the Hague, after a lingering illness that had confined her some months. She was a lady of extraordinary talents, and, as guardian for her son, she ruled with spirit and prudence. Besides the Latin, she was well acquainted with French, Spanish, Italian, and Low Dutch, and her leisure hours were spent in the company of learned men; so that, in most things, the princess was a striking image of her royal mother. The other branch of the royal family that paid the debt of nature, was the princess Elizabeth, second daughter of his royal highness Frederick prince of Wales, a young lady of an engaging aspect, and the most agreeable manners.

A. D. 1760. The first thing that engages our attention this year, is the proceedings of parliament, which were in all things satisfactory to the ministry. Seventy thousand men were allowed for the service of the royal navy, and three millions, six hundred and forty thousand pounds, were granted for maintaining them. It is unnecessary to mention all the particulars which were taken into consideration during this session of parliament; but certain it is, nothing was asked by the ministry that the commons refused. They granted a supply of fifteen millions, three thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds, fifteen shillings and nine-pence halfpenny; more than could have been raised by any nation besides Britain; but however enormous, yet it was no more than what was necessary. The militia were this year raised in several counties, and put under proper regulations; so that there was no reason to fear that the internal peace of the kingdom would be disturbed.

The commons took into consideration the statute of the ninth of queen Anne, by which it is enacted, that no person shall be elected a knight of the shire, unless he is possessed of six hundred pounds per annum, or any one returned to serve as a burgess, unless he had three hundred. It seems that this act, however salutary, and calculated to promote the interest of the people, people, by supporting the dignity of parliament, had been prostituted to the basest purposes; Methods had been found out to elude the force of it, and many persons had procured seats in the house of commons who were not qualified according to law.

To remedy an evil of so dangerous a nature, a bill was brought in, and passed both houses, by which it is enacted, that every person duly elected shall, previous to his taking the oaths, deliver in to the clerk a true estimate of his estate, and that shall be left to be inspected by any member who chuses, and the newly elected member shall swear to the truth of the contents.

Several other acts passed, particularly one for the regulation of the payment of prize-money due to seamen, which before had been left to the discretion of the commissioners of the navy. A bill was brought in, and passed, for regulating weights and measures, and proper provision was made for raising the sums granted to his majesty. After which, the parliament was prorogued by commission.

We have seen, in our account of last year's transactions, that, notwithstanding the vigilance of commodore Boys, yet M. de Thurot had made his escape out of the harbour of Dunkirk with five ships, having on board, besides seamen, above twelve hundred land forces. Proceeding to the northward, he entered the Baltic, and sailed to Gottenburgh, where having taken in fresh provisions, he returned, and anchored at Bergen, in Norway, for his design was to amuse the English, and, if possible, keep his real intentions hid from them.

The weather, as is usual in the northern seas, had been very stormy; and one of the ships in Thurot's squadron was separated from the rest, and obliged to return to France. With the four remaining ships, M. de Thurot sailed from Bergen on the fifth of December 1759; and having passed the Orkneys, he got among the western islands of Scotland, on one of which he landed on the sixteenth of January this year. There he procured some live cattle, with other sorts of fresh provisions, and then set sail for the north of Ireland. His design was to have got into the harbour of Derry; but a dreadful storm arising, another of his ships was driven off, and he never saw her afterwards, though it appears that she got safe back to France. At last they came to an anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus, and the same day the land forces were put on shore, but many of them were reduced to the most wretched condition by sickness and bad provisions.

The number of able men who bore arms amounted to little more than six hundred; and lieutenant Hall went off, with a party of men, to make proper observations on them, for as yet it was not known whether they were friends or enemies. Finding there was little doubt of their being French forces, he gave orders to his non-commissioned officers to take care that the enemy did not get round them to attack them in flank or rear; and then he returned to the town, and informed lieutenant-colonel Jennings.

The colonel ordered the gates and passes leading to the town to be blocked up and barricadoed with such materials as could be procured. In the mean time, the French came up to the gates, but were repulsed by a small number of Strobe's regiment, most of whom had not been three months in the service. It is probable that the place would not have been taken, had not there been a scarcity of ammunition; so that the parties at the gates were obliged to retreat, and take shelter in the castle. This gave the enemy an opportunity of getting in, and drawing up in the market-place, upon which it was found absolutely necessary to capitulate, and the garrison were allowed to march out with all the honours of war. It was stipulated, that no injury should be done to the town; but the magistrates having neglected, or rather being unable to furnish the French with fresh provisions, the town was put under military execution, and great excesses were committed.

An express having been sent to the duke of Bedford, at that time lord deputy of Ireland, he dispatched a messenger to captain Elliot at Kinsale, who immediately hoisted his flag on board the Æolus, having with him the Pallas and Brilliant; and on the twenty-sixth of February, he got sight of the enemy, who had embarked their land forces, in order to return to France. He came up with them near the Isle of Man, and a most desperate engagement ensued, which lasted an hour and a half; but at last the brave Thurot was killed, and his ships struck to captain Elliot.

In America, during the course of this year, the French spirited up some of the southern Indians against the English; and a company of these barbarians formed a scheme to murder Mr. Atkins, who superintended our commerce; and, to add to the atrociousness of the crime, it was intended to have been committed while Mr. Atkins was engaged in a conference with them. One of the Indians, in the most cowardly manner, laying hold of a tomahawk, struck Mr. Atkins on the head; but not having killed him, struck a second time, and missing his aim, wounded the clerk. It was necessary that an act of so atrocious a nature should not escape unnoticed; and therefore Mr. Atkins having dispatched an express to general Amherst, that officer detached twelve hundred men to South-Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, now earl of Eglington, whose courage had shone conspicuously on many former occasions since the commencement of the war. In the month of June, he arrived at Charles-Town, and from thence proceeded to the Twelve Mile River, which he crossed about the latter end of that month. He encamped the forces on a rising ground, from whence he had a prospect of the country; and being determined to surprise the enemy, he left a sufficient number of men to take care of the tents; and with the rest marched through the woods, till he came to an Indian town called Little Keowee, where the Indians fired upon him; but the English soldiers rushing in, put every one of them to the sword. From thence the colonel marched to another Indian town, called Estatoe, consisting of about two hundred families; and they having abandoned their houses, he ordered every one of them to be set on fire, after having seized on all the provisions, and every thing of value.

The soldiers having found the body of an Englishman, who had been barbarously murdered by the Indians, it exasperated them to such a degree, that they resolved to set no bounds to their resentment. Accordingly, for some time, every prisoner taken by them was immediately put to death; and although humanity may blame their conduct in that affair, yet it was, in a manner, absolutely necessary, where they had to engage with savages, who paid no regard to the law of nations, and upon whose minds nothing less than terror would make any impression.

As it was not the intention of colonel Montgomery to spread desolation every where, he rather chose to enter into a treaty with them; and, for that purpose, an Indian, named Makullakulla, and more commonly known by the name of the Little Carpenter, was given to understand, that peace would be granted them on proper terms. The Little Carpenter was always a friend to the English, and disapproved of the conduct of his countrymen when they took up arms; so that no person was considered as more proper to negotiate an affair of such importance.

The Little Carpenter left nothing undone to persuade his countrymen, the Cherokees, to accommodate matters with the English; but not being able to persuade them to hearken to the voice of reason, the colonel continued his operations, and marched into the interior part of the country. As he was obliged to march through a wood, the Indians fired upon his men in so fierce a manner from behind the thickets, that captain Morrison was killed, and part of the army obliged to give way. This disaster, however was soon overcome by the arrival of the grenadiers and light infantry, who pushed forwards till they came to a rising ground, from whence they discovered a body of the Indians encamped in the most secure manner. They attacked them with their bayonets at the head of their muskets, and having forced them to give way, pursued them into the woods; and then the colonel continued his march till he came to the Indian town Etchewee, from whence all the inhabitants had fled; so that there was plenty of provisions for the men, besides several things of value, for they were permitted to plunder.

In the latter end of July, colonel Montgomery, after having undergone many hardships, and lost about seventy men, arrived at fort Prince George, where the fatigued soldiers were permitted to refresh themselves several weeks. In the mean time, the Indians attacked Fort Loudon, on the confines of Virginia; and the garrison not being able to hold out, were obliged to capitulate on honourable terms. It is remarkable in the North-American savages, contrary to the practice of heathens in general, that they never pay any regard to the faith of treaties. Thus, when the garrison of Fort Loudon were on their march to Carolina, they were surprised by a body of the Cherokees, who massacred all the officers, except captain Stewart, and killed twenty-five of the private men, the rest being made prisoners, and sent into the heart of the country, where they were treated in the most cruel and inhuman manner, contrary to the articles of capitulation, by which it had been agreed that no hurt should be done to them.

The Little Carpenter, who seems to have been endowed with all those qualities which are necessary to constitute the character of a great man, generously laid down all he had in the world for the ransom of captain Stewart; and that officer having been conducted to Holston river, met with major Lewis, who had advanced so far at the head of a party of Virginians.

In North-America, during this year, the war was carried on with great vigour, and, at the same time, with equal success. The English were in possession of all Canada, except the town of Montreal, and some other forts on the river St. Laurence; and the chevalier de Levit, who commanded the French forces in those parts, resolved to attempt the recovery of Quebec. General Murray, who had been left commander of that place, received notice of the approach of the enemy; and finding that they had landed, he ordered all the bridges to be broken down, and the roads rendered almost impassable. Next day the general began his march to meet them; but they retreated at his approach, upon which he returned to Quebec. Upon his retreat, the enemy, amounting to near twelve thousand, including the savages, having recovered their spirits, wheeled about, and marched towards Quebec: upon which general Murray, notwithstanding the inferiority of his numbers, resolved to give them battle. Accordingly he marched out, and a most bloody engagement ensued; but the French were so numerous, that general Murray was obliged to retreat, and take shelter within the walls of Quebec, which he determined to hold out to the last extremity. On the first of May, the enemy began to cannonade the place; but the garrison made such a vigorous defence, that several of the enemy's batteries were silenced, while the firing of the others continued to slacken gradually: but, notwithstanding, there is reason to believe that the garrison would have been obliged to surrender, had not lord Colville come to their assistance. That nobleman having sailed from Halifax, met with great opposition, by reason of the vast shoals of ice which blocked up the river, and the thick fogs, which, during that season, are very dangerous to the shipping. At last, through innumerable difficulties, he was enabled to send a vessel into the harbour of Quebec, to inform the general that the fleet was making way to assist him. On the fifteenth of May, commodore Swanton arrived with the first division of the squadron; and next morning, in consequence of orders from the general, he attacked the French vessels which lay above the town, and destroyed several of them. This was a most mortifying stroke to the French army; and, in consequence thereof, they raised the siege, leaving behind them all their artillery and provisions. As soon as general Murray found that they had retreated, he drew out the garrison, in order to harass them in the rear; but they had crossed a river, so that it was not judged prudent to pursue them any farther.

During the whole of this year, general Amherst, commander in chief of the army in America, left nothing undone to support the honour and interest of his country; and all those officers and soldiers who fought under him, acted in such a manner, that many of the Indians were brought over to our interest, and became our allies.

While these affairs were transacting in America, the French and the allied army continued skirmishing with each other in Germany; and although no general could have behaved with greater courage, or displayed more shining qualities, than prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, yet the country had been so much exhausted, that his army was greatly distressed for want of provisions. The hereditary prince of Brunswick, burning for military glory, boldly attacked a large party of the French at Corbach, and would have totally defeated them, had not fresh reinforcements come up to their assistance. This obliged the prince to retreat, but within a few days afterwards, he engaged another party of the French, and, by the assistance of Elliot's light horse, five battalions were made prisoners of war. At the same time, their military chest fell into the hands of the allies, with all their arms and ammunition: and, what was most remarkable, this victory was wholly owing to the bravery of a new regiment of light horse, composed of young recruits who had never before seen an engagement.

Prince Ferdinand, who was much better acquainted with the country than any of the French generals, harassed their army in detached parties; and at last found himself under the necessity of coming to an engagement at a place called Warbourg, where the French were totally defeated; so that a communication was opened between Hanover, Westphalia, and the allied army.

In less than a week after this engagement, the hereditary prince set out on an expedition, with a chosen body of light troops; and, in the most courageous manner, beat up the French quarters, and drove them from Dymel with great slaughter.

In the eastern part of Germany, the king of Prussia was in the most distressed situation; but his brother prince Henry, one of the most accomplished generals of the age, acted with such prudence and circumspection, that he contributed, in a great measure, towards retarding the progress of the Russians, who, by this time, had made an irruption into the province of Silesia, and were spreading devastation wherever they came, without regard to age or sex, or any other distinction.

The Prussian monarch was every where engaged; for no sooner had he defeated one party of the enemy, than another started up; while count Daun, who watched all his motions, continued to harass his rear whenever his army struck their tents. This brought on a general engagement near Torgau, on the banks of the Elbe, which gave a new turn to the affairs of Europe, and was attended with consequences of the most important nature.

Marshal Daun was flushed with success; he looked upon the king of Prussia as one devoted to destruction, and imagined that one action more would totally ruin him. But nothing is more uncertain than the fate of generals and armies, nor are any in so much danger as those who look upon their enemy with contempt. The king of Prussia was now almost desperate; he had no where to turn himself, without meeting with one enemy or another to oppose him; his hereditary hereditary dominions were in a manner ruined, his most important forts were taken from him, and therefore, with the same presence of mind that had supported him under all his difficulties, he ventured upon an engagement.

Marshal Daun had drawn up his army in the most excellent order; but notwithstanding that, the king of Prussia ventured to attack him on the third day of November, about two in the afternoon. The Austrians exerted themselves with great bravery; but the perseverance of the Prussians obliged them to give way, and count Daun found himself under the necessity of retreating towards Bohemia, after he had lost a great number of his men.

Thus the Prussians were left in possession of the field, and a communication was opened between their different parties, so that they could occasionally assist each other. Indeed, of all the victories gained by the king of Prussia, this was the most important; for had he been defeated, he would have been totally ruined. He was like one who had his way to work through walls, redoubts, and enchantments; but by his conduct on this ever memorable day, he set himself, as it were, at liberty, and even became greater than ever. His army received fresh supplies, provisions were brought to them in great plenty; and although many of his soldiers were only raw young fellows, yet the conduct of their sovereign operated so strongly on their minds, that nothing seemed too difficult for them.

While the public affairs were conducting in this manner, while the British arms were crowned with success in every part of the world where they were engaged, her triumphs were in some measure damped by the loss of that person whose presence gave life to them. The venerable George the second, who had been blessed with a longer life than any king of England since the Norman conquest, was on the morning of the twenty-fifth of October, seized with a fit in his palace at Kensington, and expired without either pangs or convulsions. His majesty had got up at his usual hour, and having drank a dish of chocolate, he enquired of the page concerning the weather, being anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails. He then signified his intention of walking in the garden; but had scarce uttered the words when he fell down, and before his daughter, the princess Amelia, could come to assist him, according to his desire, he died in the arms of his servants.

His majesty was in the seventy-seventh year of his age, well shaped, of a middling stature, and a bright countenance. In his natural temper as a man, he was apt to be passionate and hasty; but in his public conduct, no prince acted with more deliberation and coolness. In all his intentions he appears to have been sincere; for when he entered into any public treaty, nothing could induce him to recede from his engagements. The servants in his household, particularly those who were more immediately about his person, were seldom changed, they lived to have grey hairs like their royal master. From this circumstance we may infer, that whatever he was in his private character as a man of a passionate disposition, yet notwithstanding he must have been a good master. That he was a tender and an indulgent parent, is evident from the whole of his behaviour to his children; and to his royal consort, who, indeed, was an ornament to her sex. In public, with respect to party disputes, the king was, during the first years of his reign, strongly attached to a minister whose conversation he delighted in, and whose abilities he esteemed; but when he found it necessary, in order to silence the public clamour, to dismiss him from his service, he never afterwards gave himself much concern who were to be his ministers. He was perfectly acquainted with the interests of the several courts of Europe, and never took up arms till in a manner he was forced to it. By his conduct the dominions of the house of Austria were prevented from being dismembered, and many millions were expended for that purpose; his majesty well knowing that the safety of Europe, and the interest of the protestant religion depended on preventing the French coming into Germany. But notwithstanding his zeal in favour of the Austrian family, yet he remained no longer their friend than they were the friends of the empire; from which we may conclude that he had a good heart, and a clear as well as a solid understanding.

All party distinctions were buried in oblivion at the time of his death; and those unfortunate young gentlemen, whose fathers had been concerned in the rebellion, were provided for either in the army or navy. Such as were disaffected to the government, blamed his majesty for a partial attachment to his German dominions, without considering that he never neglected to attend to the affairs of Britain. Born and educated in Hanover, it was natural for him to love that country. He lived in it till he was in the thirty-second year of his age, so that he never attained a perfect knowledge of the English language; a circumstance that has been much dwelt on by some late authors, who from thence infer, that he was not a friend to learning. Nothing, however, can be more false; for it is well known that he established the famous university of Gottingen, on the most extensive plan, and filled the chairs with professors of such abilities, that he lived to see it the most shining seminary in Europe. He ordered all the books that had been collected by the kings of England since the time of Henry VII. to be deposited in the British Museum, and there he ordered to be deposited all the manuscript letters written by any of our sovereigns, from the death of Edward III. to the death of queen Anne. Queen's College in Oxford, was in a manner almost rebuilt at his expense, and many new professorships were added both to the English and Scotch universities. Let history be ransacked from the most early ages, few princes will be found like George II. who could unite, in his own person, two virtues totally opposite, namely, that of being able to conduct the affairs of two different governments. In Hanover, though possessed of absolute unlimited power, yet he exerted that power in making his subjects happy, and was considered by them as an indulgent parent. In Britain, where his conduct was circumscribed by law, he acted like a wise magistrate, and never undertook any thing of importance, till he had first consulted his parliament, by whose advice he was constantly directed.

Upon the whole, if George II. was not so brilliant in what was commonly called wit, yet he had the most solid judgment, which, perhaps, is a thousand times superior. He grew up, as it were, to an advanced age in the love of his subjects both at home and abroad; every year made him more beloved than the last; and when he paid the debt of nature, one tear was shed for him; or, in other words, the whole nation mourned at once. He left a most glorious example to his successor, which it is hoped he will never deviate from; and, in general, his subjects were rich and happy.

With respect to the state of learning during this long reign, it continued advancing towards perfection. Many great men made their appearance in the literary world, and although they did not make such a shining figure as some have done in the present reign, yet they laid a foundation for the noblest improvements in every art or science. Simpson, Saunderson, and M'Laurin carried the knowledge of the mathematics to an height unknown before. Physic and natural history were cultivated by many learned gentlemen, among whom were Dr. Mead and Sir Hans Sloane, and the Doctors Warburton and Newton stood forth in defence of Divine Revelation. In a word, the reign of George II. produced many great men, some of whom are now bright ornaments to their country, while such as are dead, have left behind them the most illustrious examples.

G E O R G E III.

A. D. 1760. GEORGE III. succeeded his grandfather in the twenty-third year of his age, after having received a liberal education. The privy-council was immediately assembled, when his majesty informed the members that he was determined to act on the same principles as his royal grandfather, and that he had no other intention but that of promoting the happiness of his people. His majesty then took the oaths to maintain the church of Scotland as by law established; and having signed two instruments for that purpose, one of them was deposited among the archives of the council, and the other transmitted to Edinburgh, to be recorded in the court of session. The next thing done by his majesty was to assemble both houses of parliament, not to transact any business but that of swearing in the members, whose oaths of allegiance were become absolved by the death of the late king. The duke of Rutland, being constituted high-steward, swore in all the commons; and the lord-keeper administered the oaths to the peers. It is almost impossible to conceive the satisfaction that the subjects, in general, expressed at the conduct of their young sovereign, and his many virtues made them almost forget the loss they had sustained by the death of his royal predecessor.

On the eighteenth of November, both houses of parliament met, and the king was conducted to the house amidst the acclamations of a brave and loyal people. In his speech he told them, that he was sensible of their loss in the death of his grandfather, but that it should be the whole study of his life to make them happy, by promoting their interests both at home and abroad. He solicited the assistance of all his subjects in general, as he was determined to act in such a manner as was consistent with his duty both to God and men. He rejoiced that he was born and educated in this island, and that the name of a Briton was to him superior to all others. The vast success that had attended our army and navy were both attended to, and his majesty requested that the commons would grant the necessary supplies.

Addressees from both houses, full of the most loyal expressions, were presented to his majesty, and the commons granted the sum of eight hundred thousand pounds, to defray the expences of the civil list.

A. D. 1761. The first thing done by the parliament, after the holidays were over, was to pass an act in favour of insolvent debtors; who, in consequence of giving up all their effects, were to be discharged by the justices at the quarter-sessions. No act was ever brought into the house at a more seasonable juncture; for the prisons were filled with poor unfortunate creatures, whose wives and children were starving. This act, however, had in it a clause, attended with such consequences, that it was found necessary to repeal it. It was imagined that every creditor might compel a debtor to give up his effects, and if he concealed any of them, to the amount of twenty pounds, he was to suffer death as a felon. This clause was laid hold of by many of the lower sorts of tradesmen, who, in order to cheat their creditors, got one of their own relations to compel them to account; so that a door was opened for perjury, and many persons were deprived of their property under the prostituted authority of an act of parliament. Indeed, the abuse became so glaring, that the city of London presented a petition to have it repealed; but it did not take place till the meeting of the new parliament.

The king sent a message to both houses, importing, that as nothing could contribute more towards promoting the interests of the people, than that of rendering the judges independent, so he desired they would grant him leave to advance their salaries, and that they should hold their places by patent for life; for by the act of settlement at the revolution, they were to expire within six months after the death of the king. In consequence of this message, the salaries of the nine puisne judges in England were advanced from fifteen hundred, to two thousand pounds and the three chiefs in proportion. In Scotland, the lord president, instead of one thousand pounds a year, was allowed thirteen hundred; the lords of session seven hundred instead of five; and the lords of justice, one thousand instead of seven hundred.

On the continent of Europe most of the powers engaged in the war, were desirous to propose preliminaries for a lasting peace; but in Germany, the armies continued to fight in detached parties. For this purpose several ambassadors were sent to different courts, and among the rest, M. de Bussy came over from Paris to London, in order to adjust matters concerning our disputes in America, and Mr. Stanley went on the same errand to Paris. Some months were spent in negotiations, without coming to any conclusion; when the French, by delusive promises, brought the king of Spain to concur with them in the prosecution of the war.

In the mean time the island of Bellisle was taken from the French by general Hodgson, and a squadron of ships of the line, commanded by commodore Keppel; but this conquest was not obtained without great difficulties, for the English lost near two thousand men.

In Germany, prince Ferdinand with the allied army penetrated into Thuringia, and drove the French from several of their advanced posts; but the duke de Broglie, having collected his army together, attacked the hereditary prince of Brunswick, and made above two thousand of his men prisoners of war.

In the East-Indies, colonel Coote, in conjunction with admiral Stevens, took the French town of Pondicherry, by which the French lost all their settlements on the coast of Coromandel. This was a sudden and most unexpected blow, which ruined the French commerce; for although they left nothing undone to stir up the mogul in their favour, yet the bravery of the English overcame all their attempts, and they were beaten in every quarter.

The British arms in America were still triumphant, so that our ministry had it in their power to make peace on what conditions they pleased; but we must now turn our thoughts to another subject.

In the month of July his majesty, having assembled the privy-council, declared to them his intention of marrying the princess Charlotte of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz, a young lady possessed of every valuable accomplishment, accomplishment, and the admiration of all those who had the pleasure of being acquainted with her. The council were so well satisfied with his majesty's choice, that they not only commended it, but at the same time desired that he would make it public to all his subjects; and accordingly, a proclamation was inserted in the Gazette, intimating, that the obligation he was under to his people, induced him to fix his mind on a princess, whom he intended to make his consort; in order to promote the interest of the protestant religion consistent with the act of settlement.

The earl of Harcourt was then sent over ambassador extraordinary, to marry the princess by proxy, which being done, lord Anson was dispatched with the royal yachts, and a small squadron of ships to convey her to England. The ladies employed to attend the princess, were the dutchesses of Hamilton and Ancafer; and on the eighth of August the fleet set sail from Stade, amidst the acclamations of the people. The wind, having shifted to the south, the passage was very tedious, and most of the ladies on board were taken extremely ill; but the princess maintained such a flow of spirits and vivacity, that she charmed all those who approached her.

In the afternoon of the seventh of September, the squadron came to an anchor at Harwich, and the princess, with her retinue, being landed, she proceeded on her journey through Colchester, and lodged that night at Witham, a seat belonging to the earl of Abercorn. Vast crouds of people came to see her, and next day she was met at Rumford by the king's coaches, escorted by a party of the horse-guards. From Rumford she proceeded, through innumerable crouds of people, to Whitechapel; and without entering the city, turned up towards the New Road, and so on till she came to the gate of St. James's, where she was received by the duke of Devonshire, as lord-chamberlain of the household. She was then conducted by the duke of York to the king, who received her in the most affectionate manner; and at nine in the evening the nuptial ceremony was performed in the Chapel Royal, by Dr. Secker, archbishop of Canterbury. On the twenty-second of September their majesty's were crowned in the abbey church of Westminster, and addresses of congratulation were sent up from all the cities and corporations in the kingdom.

In the mean time the war was carried on with great fury between the allies and the French, for the latter were so impoverished, and all their funds so exhausted, that they knew not what to do, unless by one bold stroke they should force a way into Hanover. The duke de Broglie resolved to attack the advanced posts under the command of the marquis of Granby; but the prince of Brunswick had notice of his intentions, and took his measures accordingly. The allied army was drawn up with great judgment, and stretched in one continued line over several rising grounds; being flanked on one side by the river Aest, and on the other by a morass. Towards the evening of the sixteenth of July, the French began the attack; but the allies, who behaved with the greatest bravery, drove them back, and forced them to take shelter in the woods. In the mean time the allies, finding that the French intended to come to a general engagement, prepared to meet them; and next morning at three o'clock, both armies were drawn up. The firing continued about five hours, till the French, having taken possession of a rising ground on the flank of the British horse, began to erect a battery upon it; but the prince of Brunswick sent a fresh body of foot to dislodge them, and then they fell into confusion. Vast numbers of the French were killed; but prince Ferdinand had drawn up his men in so advantageous a situation, that he did not lose above five hundred.

This battle was fought near the village of Werle; and did great honour to the prince, as well as all the officers and soldiers in the allied army. It was not, however, decisive; for the French still seemed in-exhaustable in numbers. They were continually receiving new reinforcements, so that the prince was obliged to exert himself to the utmost to oppose them.

The prince de Soubise was detached towards Munster, with a view of besieging that city; and as the prince of Brunswick was obliged to watch the motions of marshal Broglie, several smart skirmishes happened between the advanced parties; but the allies seemed, in general, to gain the advantage. The prince of Brunswick was so well acquainted with the country, and had formed such a proper judgment of the designs of the French, that he marched first towards Hesse, and then, by a movement to the left, wheeled about towards Paderborn, by which he was prepared to meet marshal Broglie whenever he thought proper to advance. The French, during this time, took several small towns, and committed great cruelties, besides demanding very heavy contributions. Prince Ferdinand found it absolutely necessary to keep his army together, lest they should have been weakened by separation; and although he could not act offensively, yet the situation of his camp was such, that it would have been dangerous for the enemy to attack him, especially as he was well supplied with provisions.

During the month of June this year, the island of Dominique, in the West-Indies, was taken from the French, by a party of English forces under the command of lord Rollo, and assisted by commodore Sir James Douglas, with four ships of the line. At first the inhabitants would have submitted, but M. de Longprie, the governor, stirred them up to hold out, under pretence that some ships would soon arrive to their assistance.

Lord Rollo, finding him obstinate, landed with a party of grenadiers, commanded by colonel Melville, and drove the enemy from their advanced posts, after which they proceeded to the head quarters of the governor, whom they took prisoner with all his officers. Next day the magistrates, and indeed all the inhabitants of the island, except the soldiers, took the oaths to our government. The forts that had been damaged were repaired, and every thing settled in a proper manner; after which lord Rollo and Sir James Douglas set sail for the island of Guadalupe.

The Spaniards had now, in some measure, pulled off the mask; and as their designs could be no longer concealed, Mr. Pitt proposed in council, that a fleet should be sent to intercept their fleet, that was coming from the West Indies, but this was opposed by the majority of members. This great minister, by whose wisdom and integrity the British arms had become successful in every part of the globe, was well convinced that his opinion was of too much importance to be slighted; and therefore he resigned all his employments. Certain it is, that no man was ever better qualified to conduct the affairs of government than Mr. Pitt. To a liberal education, he had joined an extensive reading; and his conduct in parliament convinced the British senate, that his memory was equal to his judgment and eloquence. His majesty was so sensible of the vast abilities of this great man, that he settled on him a pension of three thousand pounds per annum, for life, and for the life of his son; his lady being, at the same time, created a peeress in her own right.

On the third of November the new parliament assembled, and Mr. Onslow, who had been speaker thirty-three years, resigned on account of his great age and infirmities. The commons having elected Sir John Cust in his room, the king approved of their choice; and then going to the house, delivered a speech to the following import:

He told them, that the success of the British arms must give pleasure to all his faithful subjects; and as the enemy still refused to hearken to proper conditions of peace, he was determined to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour; and for that purpose doubted not but the commons would assist him with the proper supplies. He told them, that the proper estimates should be laid before them, and that the utmost œconomy should be observed by himself. He concluded by recommending to them the making a suitable provision for the queen, who was, in every respect, an ornament to her sex: and, in answer to this speech, both houses presented most loyal addresses.

The earl of Bristol, who had been some time at the court of Spain, was ordered to demand why they committed depredations on our commercial navy; but the answers he received were no better than evasions. The earl finding that no dependence could be placed on what the Spanish ministry said, returned to England; and the count de Fuentes, the Spanish ambassador, left London, after having delivered a memorial to the secretary of state, wherein he attempted to justify the conduct of his court.

A. D. 1762. The first thing of national importance undertaken this year, was the granting of letters to our captains of ships, to make reprisals on the Spaniards; and in two days afterwards, namely, on the fourth of January, war was declared. On the nineteenth the king went to the house of peers, and laid before the parliament the whole of his proceedings in this affair; upon which they promised to assist him in the war to the utmost, being convinced that his designs were just.

A large fleet had failed from Portsmouth in October the preceding year, in order to attack such of the French settlements in the West-Indies as had not been subdued; and the whole fleet, with the transports, were ordered to rendezvous at Barbadoes. There they were joined by some transports from North-America, having on board a considerable number of land-forces, their design being to attempt the conquest of the valuable island of Martinico. This was one of the most important objects the ministry had in view; for, besides the intrinsic wealth of the island, it was the center of all the French trade and commerce in the West-Indies. The towns and harbours were strongly fortified; and the roads in the interior part of the island were guarded by militia, and defended by redoubts. The attempt was attended with every danger that could be imagined; for the climate was extremely hot; and the fresh water being scarce, there was reason to fear that both the seamen and soldiers would be thrown into fluxes, which would prove more detrimental to them than the force of the enemy.

The fleet was under the command of admiral Rodney; and general Monkton, who had so bravely distinguished himself in North-America, conducted the land-forces, amounting to eighteen battalions, but many of the companies were not full. On the eighth of January, they came to an anchor in the bay of St. Ann, near the eastern part of the island, where the men of war silenced some batteries which had been erected by the French; but the general being of opinion that it was not a proper place to land the forces, the colonels Grant and Haviland were sent, with two brigades, under a proper convoy, to the bay of Petiteanse, where they took a strong battery from the enemy. On the sixteenth, the whole army on board the transports being come up, the general landed them without opposition, but found the roads almost impassable. On the twenty-fourth, the general attacked a fort that guarded one of the passes leading to Port-Royal, and took it, after a most obstinate resistance, while colonel Grant stormed the advanced posts.

The British forces marched on with such rapidity, that, in two days, they were in possession of all the out-works which defended the citadel: upon which the governor, finding himself unable to hold out the place any longer, consented to capitulate. On the eighth of February, the English being in possession of the gates, the garrison, amounting to about eight hundred men, were suffered to march out with all the honours of war; but the governor-general of the island, who resided at St. Pierre, declared that he would defend the place to the last extremity. This, however, was only a vain bravado; for the English, having made themselves masters of all the other parts of the island, prepared to attack that place, when deputies were sent to the general, offering to capitulate. By these means, not only the valuable island of Martinico became the property of Great-Britain, but, at the same time, it opened a way for the conquest of the smaller islands and settlements adjoining to it.

An important object now presented itself to the British ministry, namely, that of carrying the war against Spain into the West-Indies, from whence all their riches are derived. The Havannah, the center of their Indian commerce, was at that time strongly defended, and it was reckoned impossible to take it; but nothing was too difficult for the British forces to undertake. Nineteen ships of the line, with many smaller vessels, were fitted out, under the command of admiral Pocock; and about ten thousand land-forces, commanded by the earl of Albemarle.

Perhaps no expedition was ever attended with more dangerous consequences, nor any conducted with greater prudence. At first, the admiral intended to have landed on the south side of the island of Cuba, where it was supposed he might fall in with the Spanish galleons; but that opinion was over-ruled in a council of war, and the fleet continued on a course of seven hundred miles, in a very dangerous sea.

The admiral had no pilot to direct him; but being in possession of an excellent chart of those seas, taken by lord Anson, he depended on his own judgment, and dispatched a ship to make proper enquiries whether there was a probability of passing. On the return of the ship, the admiral ordered the fleet to weigh anchor, and hoist sail, continuing under way, in three divisions, consisting of the ships of the line, the frigates, and the transports. On the ninth of June, they got out of these dangerous seas, and came within sight of St. Jago, on the eastern extremity of the island of Cuba. St. Jago is the capital of Cuba; but although the courts of justice are held there, yet the Havannah is the seat of commerce, and, consequently, of the utmost importance. From St. Jago the fleet continued their voyage to the Havannah; but when they arrived there, they found they had more difficulties to encounter than they had as yet imagined.

The passage to the harbour is extremely narrow, and above half a mile in length, at the end of which is a large basin, in which a thousand ships may ride in safety. On the one side of the narrow passage is the Moro Castle, a strong fort built for the defence of the place, and to prevent any ships from coming in but such as have passports. To the westward of the harbour stands the town, strongly fortified with a parapet, redoubts and bastions; the whole being surrounded by a ditch, and cannon placed every where. Indeed, the difficulties they had to encounter seemed insurmountable; and the admiral, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, bore away, with a large part of the fleet, to the westward, where he made as if he would have landed; while commodore Keppel and captain Hervey landed the forces on the east of the harbour without the loss of a man, although the Spaniards had a considerable fleet then lying at anchor, which might have done them great damage.

The earl of Albemarle divided the army into eight brigades; one of which, under the command of general Elliot, was ordered to march up the country, in order to prevent any supplies being sent to the town, and to cover the siege in the rear. General Keppel and colonel Howe were ordered to make a diversion on the west of the town; while the general, with the main body of the forces, attacked the Moro Castle, that being the grand object in view, because it defended the entrance to the harbour.

Those who will compare the account of this famous siege with the retreat of Xenophon, or the passage of Hannibal over the Alps, will prefer the valour of the the British troops to that of either the Greeks or Carthaginians. There was no fresh water to be had; and as the men were obliged to cut their way through woods, and drag the cannon along with them, so many of them died on the spot through the heat of the climate, and the fatigues they underwent in the service of their country. But courage and perseverance overcame all difficulties; for batteries were erected in the night on the rising grounds, to cover the approaches, and make way for the reduction of the place. To do justice to the Spaniards, it must be acknowledged that they defended the place with great bravery, and, for some time, the fire was, in a manner, equal on both sides. On the twenty-ninth of June, in the evening, they made a sally; but although they acted with great courage and resolution, they were obliged to retreat, with the loss of above three hundred men.

All the batteries being now opened, the admiral ordered the Cambridge, the Dragon, and the Marlborough, to sail up to the fort, under the command of captain Hervey; and then a most dreadful firing began. The Spanish artillery was well conducted, and it would seem that the best officers under their government had been at that time in the Havannah. As the Moro Castle was situated on a high rock, the ships could not, after seven hours firing, make the least impression on it.

In this attack, the English lost one hundred and fifty men; which is not to be wondered at, when we consider that, besides the Moro Castle, they had another battery playing upon them from an opposite fort, which galled them excessively; so that they were obliged to retire, otherwise they would have been destroyed. Among those killed in this hazardous attempt, was captain Goofrey, a brave officer, who had, on many former occasions, given the most signal proofs of his courage; but duty, and the love of glory, were the sole objects he had in view.

No sooner were the English men of war gone to rejoin the fleet, than the Spaniards turned their attention to the eastern part of the fort, and resolved to hold out to the last extremity; so that the English officers found the reduction of the place would be a work of time. Indeed, an unforeseen accident happened at this time, which tended, in a great measure, towards retarding their operations, namely, the destruction of a battery, which took fire by the explosion of a mortar. Sickness likewise rendered many of the men incapable of acting, and the few who remained in health were fatigued beyond description. Add to this, the want of fresh provisions, the heat of the climate, and the insupportable fatigues which both officers and men underwent, by which many gave themselves up to despair, and sunk under the load of their misery.

About this time, however, they received a very seasonable supply; for a fleet arrived from New-York, and another from Jamaica, having on board a large quantity of provisions, which gave new life and spirits both to the army and navy.

It was now evident that no time was to be lost, and that, unless an immediate attack was made, the men would become dispirited, and the whole enterprise sink into nothing. It was therefore agreed, that the miners should be employed; but they had a deep ditch to cross, so that it was with the utmost difficulty they got over it, and entrenched themselves under a rock, where they were not perceived by the enemy.

The governor of the Havannah, sensible that the English would make themselves masters of the Moro Castle, unless he could send fresh reinforcements to it, ordered twelve hundred men to be put on board the boats in the harbour, and to land and attack the English. Accordingly these men landed, and attacked our forces in three different places, but with so little success, that upwards of four hundred were left dead on the spot; some were drowned, and the rest, with much difficulty, saved themselves, by getting into their boats.

On the thirtieth of July, the miners blew up a part of the wall, by which a breach was made; and although it was small, yet the engineers were of opinion that the army might attack it. The English troops now mounted the breach in such good order, that the enemy became intimidated, after above four hundred of them had been killed; among whom was the marquis de Gonsales, the second in command, a brave officer, who had exerted himself to the utmost during the siege, and died animating the soldiers to defend the place. The same fate happened to Don Lewis de Velasco, the commander in chief, who disdaining to ask quarters, collected as many men as yet remained, and making a stand with them, received a mortal wound while holding out his sword to the conquerors.

The English being now in possession of the fort, which had cost them the lives of many brave men, during a siege of forty-four days, turned the cannon against the town. Several batteries were, at the same time, erected on the rising grounds near the town; and the earl of Albemarle being willing to save as many lives as possible, sent a message to the governor, desiring him to surrender, as it would be in vain to hold out any longer; but the governor, though he returned a polite answer to the earl, yet refused to comply, declaring that he would hold it out to the last extremity.

Immediately the firing began on both sides; but in little more than six hours, all the artillery belonging to the enemy were silenced, and a flag of truce hung out, to the great joy both of the army and navy, who were in the utmost distress for want of provisions.

The garrison were allowed to march out with all the honours of war: and thus the whole island of Cuba was given up to Great-Britain on the fourteenth of August. The enemy lost their whole fleet that was in the harbour; a sum of money, amounting to three millions, was taken by the victors; and the commerce of Spain in the West-Indies was, for some time, totally ruined.

About this time, two English frigates took a rich Spanish ship near Cadiz; and having carried her into Gibraltar, found her cargo to consist of near twelve millions of money, besides many valuable articles of merchandize. These were mortifying strokes to the Spaniards, who had been led into a war without any apparent necessity, merely by the intrigues of the French, whose commerce had been totally ruined by the English cruizers. It was therefore resolved upon, in the court of Madrid, that the kingdom of Portugal, with whom we were in the strictest alliance, should be invaded; and a body of forces marched towards the frontiers, in order to distress the inhabitants.

The parliament met on the twenty-fifth day of November; and his majesty, going to the house of peers, opened the session, by telling them, that nothing was more desirable to him than a lasting peace, procured on such honourable terms as would secure the happiness of his people. For that purpose, he had once more condescended to renew the negotiation that had been broken off before; and he spoke of the conduct of his army and navy in the highest terms of applause. He took notice, that he had been obliged to send an armed force to support his good ally the king of Portugal, who was threatened by the whole Spanish army, in consequence of the intrigues of the French, who, notwithstanding their numerous losses, seemed still averse to peace. He concluded by telling the commons, that nothing gave him so much unhappiness as the consideration that his subjects were burdened with taxes; but then there was a necessity for it, otherwise it would have been impossible to have defeated the enemies schemes, and rendered their undertakings abortive.

At this time the duke of Bedford was sent over to France in consequence of the rage of party spirit at home, and preliminaries for a general peace were signed at Fontainebleau, and afterwards laid before the commons on the ninth of December. It was expected that these preliminaries would have been severely censured; but they were approved of without much opposition, which increased the public discontent more than ever.

On the twelfth of August, this year, the queen was delivered of a son, who was soon after created prince of Wales, and still lives admired by the people, who expect that he will one day sway the scepter of these kingdoms.

All Europe was now longing for peace; Spain had been brought into a snare, and Germany was drenched with blood; France was reduced to beggary, and the king of Prussia, who had weathered many storms, and still supported his ground against all his enemies, found his treasury exhausted, and his country in a manner depopulated. Britain alone was vigorous, for all opposition had given way to our arms; and therefore we had reason to expect peace upon whatever terms we thought proper to prescribe.

A. D. 1763. The first thing of any importance that took place during the beginning of this year was the treaty of peace concluded at Paris, on the tenth day of February. By this treaty there was to be a general release of prisoners not then exchanged, and they were to be sent home to their respective countries, at the expence of the sovereign who had them in custody. Canada, Nova-Scotia, and the island of Cape Breton, were ceded to Great Britain; and it was stipulated, that the inhabitants should enjoy the free exercise of the Roman catholic religion, in the same way as if they had been under the French government. All such of the inhabitants as did not chuse to live under the British government, were to have liberty to dispose of their estates, and to remove with their families to any part they thought proper; only that they were obliged, consistent with the principles of equity and common sense, to pay such debts as they had contracted.

The river Mississippi was to be the boundary between the British and French colonies in North America; and in the West-Indies, the king of Great Britain gave up to the French the conquered islands of Martinico and Guadalupe, with all the smaller ones depending on them. The island of Bellisle was given in exchange for Minorca; and the Grenades, with all the other islands depending on them, were ceded to Britain. All our conquests on the river of Senegal, were confirmed to us; and in the East Indies part of the French settlements were restored, and part were retained. The French were obliged to give up such places as they had taken possession of in Germany; and in consequence of the king of Spain's giving up all pretension to Florida, and ceding it to the English, the Havannah, with the whole island of Cuba, were to be restored. The king of Prussia was to remain in the same condition he was in before the commencement of the war; and the same was to take place with respect to the empress queen.

Such were the principal articles in this treaty of peace, and much has been said both for and against it. On the one hand, it has been asserted, that as we had, at a vast expence of blood and treasure, reduced the French nation to a state of beggary, so we ought, in order to keep them humble, to have retained all the conquests to ourselves; for by so doing, their commerce being effectually ruined, they would not have been able for many years to give us the least disturbance. On the other hand, it was urged, by such as were friends to the peace, that the advantage to Britain was very great, and that we had not only regained the island of Minorca, but that we had acquired the most extensive territories in North America and the West Indies, which, if cultivated in a proper manner, would turn out to the advantage of the mother-country. It was urged further, that had we insisted on retaining all, we might have lost all. The body would have been too large for the head, and the inhabitants being mostly French, they would have been obliged to keep up a large standing army to enforce the execution of the laws, and promote good order among the people.

Such were the arguments used by the parties who took place at that time, and the reader is left to judge for himself, especially as the affair is too recent to be critically animadverted upon. Certain it is, that a great many arguments may be used on both sides; but the business of an historian is, to relate facts, and leave the public to draw from them what inferences they think proper.

On the nineteenth of April his majesty went to the house of peers, and in a speech from the throne, expressed the utmost satisfaction, that they had approved of the treaty of peace, and that, in consequence thereof the horrors of war were now at an end. He added, that notwithstanding the increase of his family, yet he would observe the strictest economy, and that his attention should be placed on promoting the happiness of his people.

As no men, whether soldiers or sailors, had ever behaved better than the English during this war, so the first object the legislative power had in view was to bestow upon them some marks of favour. Grants of lands were made to those who chose to settle in the conquered countries of North America; and by these prudent methods, many persons, who would otherwise have been an intolerable burthen to the nation, were decently provided for, and usefully employed. This was most certainly an act of great humanity, and it is hoped will, in the end, be of the utmost service to the mother-country; for the native French and civilized Indians in those countries, will become familiarized to the English government, the freedom of enquiry in religious matters will destroy the bigotry and superstition of the Roman catholics, and gradually vanish away, while commerce will be cultivated as long as a good understanding subsists between the mother-country and the colonies.

With respect to the affairs of the continent during this year, most nations who had been engaged in the war, were employed in healing their bleeding wounds, or, in other words, they were endeavouring to repair such losses as they had sustained.

The empress of Russia, who had succeeded her husband Peter II. was establishing schools and universities in her dominions, and learned men were invited from all parts of Europe to come and preside over them. Nor was she less attentive to commercial affairs; for she established factories at Astracan on the Volga, and Archangel on the White Sea. In Germany, the king of Prussia, ever attentive to the interests of his subjects, was employed in granting many immunities and privileges to the soldiers who had served him during the war, and in promoting agriculture. He had established a factory at Embden in Friedland; but Hanover laying between that province and his hereditary dominions, it could not be improved in a proper manner.

The Dutch continued in their old tract of avarice, the drudges of all nations, and not friends to any. France, Spain, and Portugal, underwent no material changes, and in Italy every thing was quiet. In England party disputes ran very high, as they had continued to do ever since Mr. Pitt had resigned the seals as secretary of state. A political paper having made its appearance, great offence was taken at it, and a general warrant was issued to take the author, printers and publishers, into custody. But the greatest blunder was, that no name was inserted in the body of the warrant, only that the messenger had verbal orders, to take the person of Mr. Wilkes, at that time member for Aylesbury, in Buckinghamshire. However iniquitous and even stupid this action was, yet it had been long practised by ministers of state, and began to be considered as law. But notwithstanding the practice seemed sanctified by long long custom, yet no sooner did Mr. Wilkes find himself injured, than he moved the court of Common-Pleas for a writ of Habeas-Corpus. The writ being served on the deputy-governor of the Tower, where Mr. Wilkes was confined, he brought his prisoner to Westminster-hall, where council was heard both for and against the legality of the commitment. Notice was taken in court, that Mr. Wilkes had been confined a close prisoner, that his friends had been denied admittance to him, nor had he been so much as allowed the use of pen, ink or paper. Upon that the judges reprimanded the governor, and as they could not give judgment on that day, he was ordered back to the Tower, where his friends and lawyers were to have free access to him.

On the sixth of May, being again brought to the bar, the lord chief-justice delivered the opinion of the court; namely, that the prisoner must be discharged, and that as some illegal actions had been practised in the commitment, he was desired to bring his action at common law for a trespass, in order to recover damages.

A.D. 1764. This year naturally opens with the history of the then state of America; for although peace had been concluded, yet the French, ever restless, had stirred up several of the Indian nations to murder such of our people as resided on the back settlements. Many of the innocent people were most barbarously murdered; and complaints thereof having been transmitted to general Gage, he resolved to penetrate into those remote countries inhabited by two fierce nations, called the Delawares and Shawanese. In consequence of that spirited resolution, colonel Bouquet was sent from Fort Pitt, with a considerable number of forces; but it was so difficult to cross the rivers, and so dangerous to march thro' the woods, that he did not arrive at Tuscarawas, the place where the troops were to rendezvous.

No sooner had the savages seen a body of armed men in possession of their towns, than they were thrown into the utmost consternation; for their chiefs had made them believe that their woods were inaccessible; but now they found that they had been deceiving themselves. Knowing that it was not in their power to engage with our forces, they had recourse to negotiation; but the colonel was too well convinced of their want of sincerity, to put any trust or confidence in their promises. He insisted that all the prisoners should be delivered up, and that they must send deputies to Sir William Johnson to treat of a peace. Forty of their chief men were, at the same time, delivered up as hostages for the faithful performance of all the articles agreed on. These preliminaries being settled, colonel Bouquet had all the prisoners delivered up to him, amounting to near four hundred, who had been cruelly confined in a state of slavery.

The English ambassador at Paris represented to the French court, that some injury had been done to our new settlers in the conquered islands in the West Indies; upon which the French ministry referred the settlement of all disputes of that nature to our governor of Jamaica. At the same time, and for reasons of a similar nature, a remonstrance was presented to the court of Madrid, complaining that some of the Spanish subjects had driven the English logwood cutters from the bay of Honduras; upon which an order was sent by the king of Spain to the governor of Juçatan, commanding him, under the severest penalties, to see that justice was done to the English. This order had the desired effect; for such as had been dispossessed, were again re-instated, and all of them permitted to carry on the trade of logwood cutting without any molestation whatever. Upon the whole, it appears that the governor had acted without orders; for the king of Spain expressed great resentment at his conduct, declaring that he had no intention of infringing the articles of peace.

In Europe, during the former part of this year, an event took place that has been attended with as fatal consequences as any thing we meet with, either in ancient or modern history.

Poland, with respect to territory, a large fertile nation, adhered to the feudal law in its utmost rigour. There the government was Aristocratical, for altho' they had a king, yet his power was so circumscribed that the government was, in every sense of the word, lodged in the hands of the nobles. No subjects can ever be happy under such a government, unless we could change the nature of man; for the Polish nobles, like the barons of old in England and Scotland, and indeed like all those barbarians who overthrew the Roman empire, had the power of life and death; they could put their tenants to death without being obliged to give an account of their conduct; so that many innocent persons were sacrificed to the caprice of a little tyrant, who considered himself as above law.

Augustus, elector of Saxony, had been king of Poland about thirty years; but dying, it was necessary to look out for one to succeed him; for in that country the king is chosen by the nobles and the clergy. It seldom ever happens that there is an election of a king of Poland, without the other powers interfering in it; each endeavours to establish some favourite of their own, and the consequences often prove fatal to the unhappy subjects. The two candidates were the elector of Saxony, son of the late king of Poland, whose interest was supported by Spain, France and Austria; and the other was the prince Poniatowski, a Polish nobleman of great fortune, universal learning, agreeable manners, and unspotted morals. His cause was strongly supported by the empress of Russia; and the king of Prussia; but most of the bishops and clergy were his enemies, because he had travelled over most protestant countries in Europe, and seemed much addicted to a free and rational enquiry into every disputed point in religion.

The prince, however, was elected, but not without great opposition; for the Roman catholic party entered a protest against the proceedings of the diet; and count Branitzki, who was at the head of the protesters, finding the danger he was in, raised a large body of forces in order to protect himself. He was assisted by some of the national troops, who had been rendered mad by the suggestions of the priests, and were now become real enthusiasts.

In the mean time a Russian army entered Poland, and on the third of July the protesters were defeated; and obliged to take refuge in Turkey. At the same time the king, who, in consequence of a custom of the country, had changed his name to that of Stanislaus, set himself about correcting such abuses as had crept into the government during the preceding reign; for so just were his notions of natural rights, and so enlarged was his mind by reading, study, and conversation, that like Agis, king of Sparta, he sought to lessen rather than enlarge the regal power.

In the East-Indies things began to have a very serious appearance, particularly with respect to the settlements of the English company. Mir Jaffer Aly Cawn, who had murdered his master and had been made nabob in his room, began his reign in the most cruel manner, by ordering all those who were related to the late prince to be murdered; and, at the same time, because he was threatened to be chastized by the English, entered into a league with several princes, who promised him their assistance.

This extravagance had reduced him to such a wretched state of poverty, that regardless of the obligations he was under to the English, he robbed several of their settlements, upon which the council at Calcutta, formed a design to dethrone him. It is evident, however, that the crimes with which they charged him, were such as did not come under their cognizance; for whatever injury he had done to his own subjects, yet it should be remembered, that he was a prince who had no right to give an account of his conduct to any but the Great Mogul, who was his absolute sovereign.

The company, however, proceeded in the execution of their scheme; and the nabob trusting to their humanity, resigned the government, and went to reside at Calcutta, while Meer Cossim was placed on the throne in his room. This young prince, who was son-in-law to the former, was of a bold, enterprising disposition; and being impatient of restraint, resolved to throw off all dependence on the English. Accordingly he strengthened himself by every measure he could think of, and began to exert that authority of which he considered himself legally possessed. He knew that the English East-India Company acted from motives of avarice; and as they had been indulged with many privileges by his predecessors, he resolved to strip them of them, and circumscribe their power within narrower bounds. This alarmed the company; and Mr. Vansittart, the governor, having concluded a treaty with him on disadvantageous terms, the council at Calcutta were so much offended, that they entered a protest against it. They affirmed, that he had gone beyond the bounds of his commission, and had assumed to himself a power with which the company had never invested him; and therefore they refused to abide by the treaty.

The event of these things was, that war was declared by the nabob against the East-India company; and some of his forces surprized, and cruelly murdered a party of the English troops. Such as were taken prisoners they immediately put to death. But this barbarity did not long remain unpunished; for major Adams having marched against them, took Patna, a strong city; while the nabob, who found it impracticable to carry on the war, fled to the dominions of Sujah Dowla, a neighbouring nabob, who acted as grand vizier to the Great Mogul. But although that prince granted him an asylum in his territories, yet he refused to give him any farther assistance, lest he should have brought upon himself the resentment of the English.

Such was the general state of public affairs at the end of this year: and although the flames of civil war had been lighted up in Poland, yet there was little reason to imagine that Great-Britain would be concerned in it.

A. D. 1765. On the tenth of January, the parliament of Great-Britain was opened at Westminster by his majesty, who, in his speech, informed the members, that there was not the least reason to suspect that the peace of Europe would, in the least, be disturbed; for all the powers on the continent seemed intent on cultivating the friendship of Great-Britain, and adhering to the articles of the peace. To the commons his majesty recommended the cultivation of those provinces which had been taken during the war; and, above all things, to preserve among themselves harmony and unanimity, as the only means of promoting the public good. He concluded by telling the members of both houses, that every scheme proposed or undertaken by them for the happiness of his subjects, should receive his hearty concurrence; and that in all things where it was necessary to impose taxes, he desired them to make them as easy as possible; that the people might not be too much burthened.

Both houses presented loyal addresses: and the house of commons, in order to raise the supplies for the current year, resolved to put the Americans on the same footing as the inhabitants of Great-Britain, by obliging them to pay stamp-duties. Great opposition was made to this bill, but at last it passed, and received the royal assent. At the same time, surveyors were sent over to the new ceded islands in the West-Indies, to divide them into parishes, and make such other regulations as were necessary.

The only business of any importance that came before the parliament this session, besides the raising the supplies, was the consideration of a proposal made by his majesty for establishing a regency, in case of his being taken off by death. The members of both houses were so sensible of the necessity of such a measure, that they presented addresses to his majesty; and an act passed, by which his majesty was enabled to appoint the queen, with the princes of the blood; and all the great officers of state jointly, regents during the minority of the prince; and that his majesty should further be allowed to add to the number of regents such persons as he thought proper, whose names should be left, in case of his death, sealed up in a deed, to be opened by the privy-council. This affair being settled, his majesty, being indisposed, on the eleventh of May prorogued the parliament, by commission, after such bills as had passed both houses received the royal assent.

On the fifteenth of August this year, Francis, emperor of Germany, died suddenly at Inspruck, whither he had gone to take leave of his second son, to whom he had given the duchy of Tuscany. Much blood and treasure had been expended by Great-Britain in raising this prince to the Imperial throne; and, in justice to him, it must be acknowledged, that although his consort took part with the French during the late war, and involved her husband in the quarrel, yet he was, in sentiments, to the last, a friend to England, and grateful for the kindness they had shewn him. Francis was succeeded by his son Joseph, who had been previously elected king of the Romans; a prince of great abilities, inflexible virtue, strict integrity, and honoured and beloved by his subjects.

While the French continued to support the Genoese against the oppressed Corsicans, other nations were employed in promoting agriculture and commerce, particularly Denmark, where great encouragement was given to all such as invented any new machine that could be of service to the public.

In the East-Indies, all the petty princes look upon the Europeans as invaders; and, perhaps, the conduct of some of them has given too much reason for the use of such an appellation. Whatever disputes these eastern princes have among themselves, yet no sooner is one of them oppressed by any of the Europeans, than his cause becomes that of the whole, and they are ready to join in support of their neighbour.

We have already seen how desperate the affairs of the nabob, Meer Cossim, were at the conclusion of the last year: and, much about the same time, died the brave major Adams, whose courage and conduct had long supported the affairs of the company. This event gave life to Meer Cossim, who having received a powerful reinforcement, took the field: but major Monro, who succeeded to the command in chief of the company's forces, a brave officer, who, from his youth, had been brought up to arms, marched out to attack him.

The Indian troops, as is usual on such occasions, were extremely numerous; but then they were but little acquainted with military discipline, and only fit to fight in detached parties, where they could have an opportunity of attacking the English by surprize. They were, however, strongly encamped, when major Monro came up with them on the twenty-second of October; so that not thinking it prudent to engage for the present, he halted within sight of them, but still out of the reach of their cannon. Next day, about nine in the morning, the major finding, that if he remained any longer inactive, the troops would be dispirited, resolved to form the line of battle, and attack the enemy in flank, for he could not do it in front, there being a deep morass before them. This movement had the desired effect; for, in about three hours, the enemy began to give way, and left on the field of battle six thousand killed, besides one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, with their military chest, arms and ammunition.

Such was the situation of affairs in the East-Indies, when major Monro was recalled; and Sir Robert Fletcher, an officer brought up in the company's service, service, was appointed to command in his room. He took the field as soon as he arrived; and marched about one hundred and fifty miles up the river Ganges, where he attacked several of the enemy's forts, and made the garrisons prisoners of war.

In America, great disturbances happened on account of the stamp-act: for although the mother-country had expended great sums of money in supporting the colonies, yet the inhabitants refused to be taxed by any besides their own representatives in their provincial assemblies. Scurrilous papers were published in most of the capital towns, reflecting on the administration; and, in general, mobs and tumults took place every where. The gentlemen who had been sent over from England to act as officers of the stamp-duties, were seized by the populace, and obliged to swear that they would for ever renounce all connection with those employments to which they had been appointed. Such of the natives in Boston as were suspected to have countenanced the act, had their houses burnt down. The magistrates were treated in the most ignominious manner; and one gentleman, more obnoxious to them than the rest, was forced to deliver up all his papers, so as to give evidence against himself; a circumstance the more cruel, because he only acted in a public character.

It is not to be supposed that these riots were carried on altogether by the populace, for undoubtedly many persons of the highest rank in those parts secretly fomented the disturbances. This appeared evident soon after; for no sooner had these disaffected persons seen the success of the rioters, than they pulled off the mask, and joined with them.

In the mean time, the governors of the provinces convened the assemblies, and proposed that they should, by some public act, make good the loss of the sufferers; but this they refused to do, although they condemned the conduct of the rioters, and offered rewards for apprehending them. This behaviour of the assemblies was approved of by their constituents, the freeholders, who gave them directions to oppose every measure that should tend towards promoting the execution of the stamp-act, and to leave nothing undone in order to get it repealed; all which they promised to comply with, so that the governors knew not in what manner to act.

At last the assemblies went so far as to avow and acknowledge, that every thing done by the populace was consistent with that duty they owed to their country. That a general union might be formed between the colonies, committees were established to carry on a correspondence with the leading members, and support the common cause. Indeed, there was such harmony among all the members of the different assemblies, that their establishing committees was only a matter of form. The magistrates refused to act under a statute that seemed injurious to their country, and the gentlemen of the law refused to plead unless the act was repealed. All public business was now at a stand; the courts of law were shut; and the merchants were afraid to send their goods to America, lest they should be destroyed: so that trade seemed at an end; and the total extinction of commerce, the only support of the colonies, was on the point of being totally extinguished.

Such was the distracted state of our colonies in North-America, when, to the inexpressible regret of all those who wished well to their country, his royal highness William, duke of Cumberland, departed this life, at his house in Upper Grosvenor-street, on the last day of October, in the forty-fifth year of his age. This prince had been, from his most early youth, designed for the command of the army; and, while only a boy, he formed a company of noblemen and gentlemen's sons, who, along with himself, were trained up in military exercises. Being properly qualified, he accepted of an ensign's commission in the guards, and rose from one station to another, till at last he became the commander in chief. Ever attentive to the interests of his royal father's subjects, he freely exposed his person in the most hazardous enterprises during the war in Germany and Flanders; and, at the battle of Dettingen, when only arrived to the rank of a colonel, he commanded his own regiment, and received a wound on the thigh while advancing upon the enemy. His prudence and valour in suppressing an unnatural rebellion, are well known to the nation in general, so that nothing need be said of it in this place. As a friend to merit in distress, he never neglected any opportunity of rewarding either officers or soldiers who had distinguished themselves in the service of their country. During the interval that took place between the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle and the breaking out of the war 1756, he constantly assisted in the privy-council; and when ordered to take upon him the command of the allied army in Hanover, he cheerfully obeyed, although he knew that the French forces were double his number. If his success was not equal to his wishes, it was owing to the inferiority of his army; and when he thought proper to resign all his public employments, he retired to a private station, and spent the remainder of his life in giving proper encouragement to industry. Upon the whole, his highness was a wise counsellor, an able general, and indulgent master; and, what is still more than any of these, he was a good man.

On the seventeenth of December, the parliament assembled; when his majesty informed them of the disturbances which had arisen in America; and recommended to them to take it into their serious consideration, by laying down some plan for supporting the dignity of government, without injuring the rights of the people. Addresses were presented by both houses; and the year closed with the death of prince Frederick William, his majesty's youngest brother, who had been long in a declining way; and at last departed this life at Carleton-house on the twenty-ninth of December, in the sixteenth year of his age.

A. D. 1766. This year opened with accounts from many parts of the world of people who had been long confined in chains of slavery, beginning to assert those rights which belonged to them as men. The Georgians, a body of people who inhabit a vast tract of land near the Caspian sea, and are members of the Greek church, had been long oppressed by the Turks; and as their women are extremely handsome, they were obliged to send some of the most beautiful to Constantinople every year, to replenish the seraglio of the Grand Signior, as well as those of the great officers of state.

This was certainly a most shameful and unnatural tax, and therefore these people resolved to shake it off. They were conducted in this undertaking by prince Heraclius, the descendant of one of their sovereigns, a brave commander, and he defeated the Turks in several engagements; but not being properly supported by the Russians, who were jealous of his power, he was obliged to drop the whole, and take shelter in the northern parts of Persia.

In Egypt, and in the island of Cyprus, several insurrections happened, in consequence of the cruelties exercised on the inhabitants by the Turkish bashaws, who seemed as if they had been sent to those countries, not to govern, but to destroy the people, by depriving them of the few privileges they had left. But an army of janisaries being sent against them, they were subdued, and once more obliged to submit to the yoke of slavery.

In Poland, where the protestants, and those of the Greek church, are called Dissidents, a scheme was gradually opening to deluge that fertile country in blood. The pope had sent a bull or order to the clergy, commanding them to procure an act, that no person should be suffered to live in Poland who did not believe and profess the Roman Catholic religion, although both Greeks and protestants had been, by the most solemn treaties, endowed with those privileges.

Remonstrances in favour of those dissidents had been presented by several courts, particularly that of Peterburgh; but no regard having been paid to them by the diet or senate of Poland, an army of Russians approached within a few miles of Warsaw. The Russian general published a declaration, which was supported by another from Mr. Wroughton, the English ambassador; but the diet, instead of complying, declared, that they would adhere to the pope's bull, which had been published in all the churches by order of the prince primate.

The king said all he could in favour of the dissidents; and when he found that he could not prevail, he left the diet, thinking thereby to dissolve it; but the prince primate, in virtue of his office as second president, continued sitting several days, till the debates ran so high, that all the members retired. In the mean time, the king, blessed with an open, enlarged mind, looked with abhorrence on all manner of persecution: and although he made no attempt to change the established religion of his country, yet he hated every thing that tended towards preventing a free inquiry into disputed points.

During the month of March this year, great disturbances happened in Spain, particularly in Madrid, Barcelona, and some other cities. The king of Spain had, from his early youth, been much addicted to French customs; and having introduced their dress into his court, he published an edict, commanding all his subjects to have their cloaths made in the same manner. Nothing is more inveterate than prejudice, or the long use of one fashion in dress; and as the Spaniards had been, time immemorial, accustomed to their long cloaks, they looked upon the order as an infringement of their liberty. A signal having been given, some thousands of men, all citizens, surrounded the palace, and were fired upon by the guards, who killed several of them. Their numbers, however, continued to increase, till towards evening, when a messenger was sent to demand their reasons for acting in such a manner; upon which they cried out, that they meant no harm to the king, but that they would have the blood of the marquis of Squillacci. That nobleman, by birth an Italian, had been long prime minister to the king, and to him the people ascribed all the innovations which had been made in their dress. The marquis was too sensible of his danger to remain any longer among a people who sought his life; and therefore, having obtained permission, he set out, with his lady and family, for Italy. His departure quieted the populace, who immediately dispersed; but the king was so much offended at the loss of his favourite, that he left Madrid, and resided, during the remainder of the year, in the Escorial, about thirty miles distant.

The English affairs in the East-Indies were in a flourishing state; for general Carnac, who commanded the company's forces, obtained a complete victory over the Murrattas, a fierce people, whom Sujah Dowla had brought into the field. Sujah Dowla, with a spirit which would have done honour to an ancient Roman, resolved to throw himself on the mercy of the conqueror; but first assisted his friends in making their escape, being regardless of himself, while they were safe. Accordingly, he surrendered to general Carnac, relying solely on his generosity.

During these transactions, lord Clive arrived at Bengal, in the quality of governor of all the company's forts and settlements, with an unlimited power to act in what manner he pleased. This was, perhaps, the most flourishing year for the East-India company, for they acquired an immense treasure; but that has proved fatal to this nation; for the riches in the East being brought into England, has extended luxury throughout every part of the nation. The rents of landed estates have been raised to support it, by which the prices of all the necessaries of life have increased so fast, that although no scarcity has taken place, yet many of our industrious poor are reduced to the greatest hardship.

In England, the great object of national concern was the conduct of the Americans. On the fourteenth of January, his majesty went to the house of peers, where, in a long speech, he advised the members to hasten their proceedings, lest commerce should suffer, and the public credit should be injured. Petitions were, at the same time, presented to parliament by the merchants of London, and almost all the trading towns in the nation, setting forth, that the stamp-act had done great injury to the British manufactures; and humbly praying, that they would take the whole into their consideration, and grant such relief as, in their wisdom, should appear reasonable.

Great debates arose concerning the matter contained in these petitions, and two parties in the house of commons were extremely violent against each other. It is necessary to take notice, that this famous stamp-act had been strongly supported by Mr. Grenville, first lord of the treasury; but that gentleman having resigned all his employments the preceding year, the marquis of Rockingham was appointed in his room.

Mr. Grenville, with all his friends, stood up in defence of the act: they urged, that nothing could be more reasonable, than that those who were the natural subjects of Great-Britain, nourished by its manufactures, and protected by its armies and navies, should contribute towards the support of government, as well as those who live in the mother-country. They added, that it was beneath the dignity of government to repeal laws, in order to please a factious people: and concluded by remarking, that if once such an indulgence was granted, no laws would ever, for the future, become binding upon them; so that a step of such a nature would be an introduction to many evils, and, in the end, encourage the Americans to attempt to throw off all subjection to the British empire.

The same party dwelt long on the concessions which had been made by some of our princes to their subjects, and the fatal consequences which flowed from them. They said, that it had been acknowledged by the opposite party, that Britain had a legislative authority over the American colonies, and therefore, taxation being only a part of legislation, no man of common sense, acquainted with the first principles of logic, could stand up in defence of the conduct of those who had opposed the act.

On the other hand, the great principle contended for was, that all bodies corporate, established by charters, writs, or patents from the crown, were never taxed but in their own assemblies: that the counties palatine of Durham and Chester, which are held by prescription, had never been taxed but in their own assemblies, till they were, by statute, incorporated with the English parliament. Nay, they went farther, and insisted, that Wales, long after the reign of Edward I. was not taxed, nor did that practice commence till they were represented in parliament: that the duchy of Lancaster, although established by act of parliament, had never been taxed till it sent members; and the clergy, as a collective body, had continued to tax themselves in their own convocations till the reign of Charles II. when they voluntarily gave up that privilege, and submitted to be taxed with the other freeholders; that all the charters granted to the colonies are so many grants from the crown; and, considered in that light, all the rights and privileges of free-born subjects flowed down to them: that, in the interpretation of any dispute concerning rights, it was an invariable maxim in law to keep to that side where there were fewest doubts remaining. Thus it was evident, that the counties palatine, &c. had never been taxed till they were first represented; and as they held their privileges by grants from the crown, so the Americans were on the same same footing, and ought to be considered in the same light.

Precedents were quoted from many passages in history, both ancient and modern; such as the conduct of the Tyrians to the Carthaginians, who emigrated from them, and from a small colony with a charter, they became a most flourishing commonwealth. That the colonies in America had been peopled by those oppressed British subjects, who preferred liberty to slavery, even in the inhospitable deserts of America. That as they were still extremely poor, and as they had gone into those parts to enjoy liberty, so nothing could be more unreasonable than to attempt to deprive them of it. Many arguments were made use of out of Lock, Puffendorf, Harrington, Montesquieu, and several other writers on natural law.

To all this it was replied by those who opposed the repeal of the act, that the arguments brought in defence of the Americans, did not apply to any given proposition that had been advanced in the debate. That the precedents brought from history actually defeated their own intention; for as to Wales, a conquered province, it was considered a great and valuable privilege, to suffer them to send representatives to parliament, nor had they obtained till they first solicited for it, in the most earnest manner. That they had been long cruelly oppressed by the lords of the marches, who under pretence of demanding subsidies for the crown, enriched themselves while the poor inhabitants were starving. That the counties palatine of Chester and Durham, ought not to be brought in as precedents; for instead of being held by charters, they were so by prescription; and the earl of the one, with the bishop of the other, although exempted from being taxed, either in the Wittenagemote, before the conquest, or the parliament after it, always contributed their quota towards supporting the government. That the duchy of Lancaster was entirely out of the question; for it was a regality constituted in favour of John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III. according to the principles of the feudal law. That it was extremely diverting to hear men of learning, produce the account of Carthage, and mention a charter, while it remains a doubt whether letters were so much as known in the age that those emigrants left Tyre, and as to the Americans being poor, it was confuted by daily experience.

Such were the arguments made use of by both parties, and the reader is left to judge for himself, for as long as there are prejudices remaining in the minds of men, the impartial historian will only relate facts without drawing inferences from them. The debates being finished, a bill was brought in, which passed without the least opposition, to secure the sole dependence of the colonies on Great Britain, and then another bill was brought in for the repeal of the stamp-act, which also passed into a law.

On the sixth of June his majesty went to the house of peers and put an end to the sessions of parliament in a speech, wherein he informed them, that with respect to his connection with foreign powers, every thing wore a peaceable aspect; for as to the distractions in Poland, we were but very remotely concerned with, though he had done all in his power to bring about a reconciliation between the contending parties.

He told them, that the public business settled by them, had been of a very intricate, as well as an accumulated nature, and applauded their conduct in being so assiduous in the discharge of it. He added, that nothing could give him greater pleasure than to hear that all his subjects, whether at home or abroad, were united in principles of harmony, so as to promote the good of each other, and concluded by telling them, that notwithstanding the encrease of his family, he would attend to the strictest economy, in order to make the public expences as little as possible.

The ministry, at the head of whom was the marquis of Rockingham, were now in the height of glory; every scheme proposed by them had been carried into execution; and (what perhaps will surprize all future ages) they were beloved by the people. No changes were supposed to take place, and none were wished for; but the minds of sovereigns, as well as private persons, are equally subject to changes, and even for the same trifling reasons.

For reasons, that may be discovered by every sensible reader, the king, on the thirtieth of July, made the following changes in the ministry; changes that not only surprized the subjects of Britain, but likewise all the courts in Europe. The duke of Grafton was constituted first lord of the treasury, in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; lord Camden was sent for from Northampton, where he was on the circuit, and created lord high-chancellor, in the room of the earl of Northington, made president of the council; the earl of Shelburne was made secretary of state in the room of the duke of Richmond, Mr. Pitt was created earl of Chatham, and made lord privy-seal, and Mr. Townshend was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. Dowdeswell. With respect to these changes it must be remembered, that for some years the ministry had been so often changed, that some supposed the people were not to be acquainted with any thing transacted at the helm of affairs; but the political writers brought every thing to light, for the discontented parties vented their spleen on each other.

Such was the state of political affairs in England, when, on the first of October, the princess Caroline Matilda, youngest daughter of the late prince of Wales, and sister to his majesty, was married by proxy at St. James's, to the king of Denmark; and next day set out for Harwich. She was accompanied by her royal brother the duke of Gloucester, and on the eighteenth of the same month she arrived in safety at Altona, where she was met by the king, and the nuptials were solemnized according to the form of the Lutheran church.

The parliament met on the eleventh of November, and there having been great complaints concerning the high price of provisions and insurrections in different parts of the country, his majesty recommended the state of the nations to both houses, and desired that they would, in their deliberations, fix on some plan for the relief of his distressed subjects.

He told them, that the discontents among the people had led them to commit many acts of violence on the rest of their fellow subjects, from mistaken notions that they had been the voluntary cause of all their sufferings. That contrary to his own inclinations, but consistent with the necessity he was under to support the dignity of government, he had issued special commissions for the trials of the rioters, that the public peace might be preserved, and the minds of the lower classes of people so much intimidated, that they would be afraid to offend. He added, that he had concluded a commercial treaty with the empress of Russia, which he hoped would be of great benefit to his subjects; and took notice of the marriage of his sister to the king of Denmark, a circumstance that would strengthen the protestant interest. He concluded, by telling the commons that he confided in their wisdom and fidelity for raising the supplies, and recommended unanimity to all the members.

As the ministry had been recently changed, great opposition was made in the house to every thing proposed by administration. Nay some of the discarded adherents went so far as to attempt, to palliate, and even excuse the rioters, who had risen in different parts of the country. However, it was agreed upon by the greatest majority in both houses, that addresses of thanks should be presented to his majesty, and then they adjourned till after the holidays.

A. D. 1767. The first object that attracted the notice of parliament this session, was the state of the East-India company, which was now become extremely rich, and actually exercised a sovereign authority thority over their settlements. To all wise ministers such a circumstance must have been very alarming; and therefore a committee was appointed to examine into the affair. The charter of the company was ordered to be produced, and that a perfect knowledge might be obtained of every thing relating to their transactions, they were obliged to deliver up to the house the originals of such treaties as they had entered into with the princes in the East-Indies; and also an account of all the expences incurred by the government for the support of the company.

This was a most mortifying affair for the proprietors of East-India stock; and what was still worse, all these papers were printed and published. The question stated by administration was, "What right had the East-India company to territorial jurisdiction?"

By their charter they were even excluded from making any conquests; and yet it was certain that they had subdued several of the princes in India, and annexed their dominions to their own settlements. It was urged further, that such powers vested in a corporate body of merchants was inconsistent with the nature of government, derogatory to the dignity of the crown, and injurious to the generality of the subjects. That if the government was to support them, then all those acquisitions of territory became the property of the crown, otherwise a principle would take place similar to that in the feudal law, where regalities were established, and the chief enjoyed a commutative jurisdiction with the sovereign. That such practices would contribute towards the promoting confusion among all ranks of subjects, and might in the end lead us back to a state of barbarity, equal to that in which our predecessors were five hundred years ago.

On the other hand, those who contended for the rights of the company, argued in the following manner. They said, that the words of the charter were general, and therefore the notion of acquisitions was implied by inferences drawn from consequences, without an assigned specification. That by such a chain of reasoning, all the new settlements made in America, beyond those that were specified in the charters, might be claimed by the crown, although it was evident, that they were private property. That people who went to settle in foreign parts, especially among uncultivated savages, were obliged, for their own safety, to extend the bounds of their territories; and if the government is at some trifling expence in supporting them, it is no more than what they owe to the subjects in general. It was further urged, that if the crown had any claim on the company, the courts of law were open, where there was not the least doubt but justice would be done to all parties; and as the house of commons was not a court of judicature, so it had no right to meddle with points of law, nor could it decide on any legal privileges. That if ever such an event should take place, as that of the commons assuming a power to judge in matters of law, it would prove fatal to the subjects in general, who would chuse that their respective properties should be intrusted in other hands.

The disputes were carried on with great warmth by both parties, and the result was, that the company should, during the space of two years ensuing, pay a certain sum to the government; and that no dividend of their stock should be made without the consent of a general court of proprietors.

On the twenty-fourth of June his majesty put an end to the sessions of parliament, and on the seventeenth of September following, his royal highness the duke of York, who had gone abroad in order to make the tour of Italy, died at Monaco, a small district a little beyond Provence.

With respect to public affairs on the continent of Europe, an event took place little expected, and which surprized most people. It is well known that Italy, once the seat of learning, has been for many ages the mother and nurse of superstition; and from thence originated all those ridiculous ceremonies that debased the christian religion, and made it resemble the grossest paganism, for such is the nominal worship performed in popish churches, that a stranger would consider it in much the same light as the idolatry of the antient heathens.

For some time popery had been losing ground in those countries where it is by law established, and encreasing where it was prohibited, owing to the disgrace into which the jesuits had brought themselves. That society had been established above two hundred years, and in that time had risen to such fame, that they became objects of jealousy, and even resentment to the other orders. It is true, they were become so affluent that even princes might have looked upon them as dangerous rivals; but that was, not the sole cause of their ruin. It had been a constant practice with princes, and other great men, to make them their confessors; and it is well known, that he who acts the part of a confessor to a prince, may, with propriety, be considered as his prime minister. All secrets had been trusted with them, and as some of them were, at the same time, confessors to those in opposite interests, jealousies took place; and the king of Portugal, having been attacked in his carriage in consequence of a plan laid by these fathers, resolved to banish them out of his dominions. This happened several years before the period we are now treating off, and Spain followed the example of Portugal, by banishing them out of all their dominions, whether in Europe or America.

One would have imagined that they would have found an asylum in Italy, and it is true, they did so for some time; but during the former part of this year, they were banished from Naples and Parma, and all their estates confiscated. Under various characters, such as those of tutors, clerks, surgeons, &c. many of them have settled in protestant countries; but it is to be hoped, that parents and guardians will take care to prevent youth from being seduced by them.

In Russia, the empress had summoned all the learned men in her empire to assemble at Moscow, in order to compile a code of laws, which was the more necessary, as many of the provinces consisted of subjects governed by different laws, and these frequently clashing with each other contributed towards injuring claimants to private property, and retarded the regular course of distributive justice.

In Poland, the diet once more assembled, but as it was impossible to bring the contending parties to an agreement, the nobles, who were at the head of the dissidents, formed themselves into a separate body for their own preservation.

The attention of all the people in Europe was, this year, directed to Corfica, an island in the Mediterranean, almost adjoining to the island of Sardinia. It is extremely fertile and populous, and some centuries ago, had been given by the pope to the republic of Pisa; but the Genoese took it, and for many years treated the inhabitants in the most arbitrary and cruel manner. The spirit of liberty, however, was not extinct, it wanted only the breath of a hero to kindle it; and such a one was found in the person of the famous Paoli, a native of the island, but had travelled into other countries, where he had learned the art of war. The prudence and valour of that hero, will be transmitted to the latest ages, but we shall see in the subsequent part of this work, that overpowered by numbers, he was obliged to abandon the island.

On the twenty-fourth of November the parliament met, and was opened by his majesty, who told the members that he had assembled them at so early a period, that they might have time to deliberate with steadiness and judgment; and, in particular, he recommended to them the state of the nation with respect to the price of provisions.

The first, and indeed the principal subject engaged the attention of both houses was of such a nature, that nothing equal to it happened since the revolution.

tion. The dreadful hardships to which the poor had been reduced by the exorbitant price of provisions, became matter of serious consideration; and petitions having been presented to his majesty during the recess of parliament, a proclamation was issued, prohibiting the exportation of corn for a limited time. It is certain, that as there was an act of parliament, allowing the free exportation of corn, while at or under a certain price, the dispensing with it by proclamation was unconstitutional, especially as the parliament might have been assembled, and a bill brought in to set aside the former act. But if the dispensing power was this once exercised, certainly it was to promote the most benevolent of all purposes, namely, that of alleviating the distresses of the poor. However, as such a practice had been solemnly condemned at the revolution, and lest it should set a most dangerous precedent for succeeding princes to copy after, a bill was brought in and passed into a law, declaring the measure illegal; but at the same time to indemnify all those who had acted either in making or obeying the proclamation. The debates on this bill ran very high, and happy was it for the ministry that their intention in issuing the proclamation was good; for it was insisted on by the adverse party, that no excuse, not even absolute necessity could be pleaded in favour of those who promoted the dispensing with an act of parliament.

Those who spoke in defence of the ministry, urged the opinion of Mr. Locke, who says, it is ridiculous to suppose that there should be a single state in the world, where the prince had not, on extraordinary occasions, a right to provide for his distressed subjects; nay that it was his duty to do so, for otherwise he could not, with any degree of propriety, be called the father of his people. They maintained, that this doctrine was not contrary to the security of the civil constitution, or to the spirit of liberty, since they admitted that it could be legally exerted only in cases of the greatest necessity during the recess of parliament, and when parliament cannot conveniently be assembled.

To this it was answered, that the doctrine of necessity was the foundation of all the troubles in the reign of Charles I. especially in the affair of ship-money, when it was pretended there was a state necessity for it. That no discretionary power was left in the crown, but what was at the same time limited by some act of parliament; so that the crown could never dispense with positive laws. They urged farther, that to suspend an act, was but another name for a temporary repeal, and if the king could repeal acts, then he could make them. But the parliament did not allow this dispensing power to lodge any where but in the three branches; namely, king, lords and commons; because, though it might be once exercised for the good of the subjects, yet such were the passions of men, that it would more frequently be prostituted to the basest purposes. That if the exigencies of the case required it, let the parliament be immediately assembled, and the matter laid before them, for if the king can break through one law, he can break through all. Upon the whole, it was said, that if the doctrine of suspension, on the plea of state necessity, was admitted as constitutional, the revolution could be called nothing but a successful rebellion, a lawless and wicked invasion of the rights of the crown, and James II. was actually robbed.

Such were the arguments made use of by both parties, and certain it is, that the ministry had no right to dispense with a statute, seeing they might have assembled the parliament for that purpose. But candour will draw a veil where the action arose from motives of benevolence, although the means made use of might not be altogether constitutional.

A. D. 1768. The public business having been dispatched in parliament, the king went to the house on the tenth of March, and having thanked the commons for their generously granting the supplies for the year, desired them to preserve peace among their neighbours in their counties and towns, especially during the next general election. He then prorogued the parliament to the last day of March; but on the twelfth a proclamation was issued, whereby they were dissolved. At the same time writs were issued for electing new members; and in many parts of the country the contests between the different candidates ran so high, that many scandalous actions were committed.

The new parliament met on the eleventh of May, and the commons having chosen Sir John Cust for their speaker, the lord chancellor Camden opened the session by virtue of a commission from his majesty. Both houses presented loyal addresses to his majesty, beseeching him to put the laws in execution against all those concerned in riots or tumults. The growing price of provisions had driven many of the lower classes of people to a state of distraction, and several irregularities had been committed, especially in Spital-fields; where many poor families did not only struggle under the dearth of provisions, but were also destitute of work. Undoubtedly the keeping the price of provisions as low as possible, is the grand object that all government ought to have in view; for by attending to that, commerce is encouraged, and the people are kept in proper subjection to the laws; but when such things are neglected, all runs into the utmost confusion, which forbodes the ruin of a state.

Nothing further was done this session, besides choosing the proper committees, and then the parliament was prorogued. The affairs in England being not very interesting, we must now consider such transactions as happened on the continent of Europe, especially the north and east, where war had broke out between the great empires of Turkey and Russia. The Russians, who a century ago, were no better than barbarians, are now become a most powerful people; and in many parts of that vast empire, learning is cultivated, and commerce encouraged. So rapidly indeed have the people in Russia proceeded in the cultivation of their intellectual faculties, that there are but two things wanting to make them the most powerful people in the world, namely, a settlement on the Black Sea, and the resignation of all claims to those extensive countries in Asia, which border on China, and over which they have no more than a nominal sovereignty. By the former, they would be able to extend their commerce with great facility along the shores of the Mediterranean; and by the latter, they would be relieved from the necessity of keeping up too great an army to govern barbarous nations not worthy of their notice, and unable to repay the expence. Like the Roman empire at the death of Trojan, Russia is too large to be governed by one head; and however willing sovereigns may be to give up their claims to nominal territories, yet we are assured from history, and convinced by daily experience, that an empire too large is never well governed. The empress of Russia was sensible of this, and as she had nothing more at heart than the civilizing of her people, by compleating the great plan laid down by the Czar Peter, so she considered the distresses in Poland, and the conduct of the French in stirring up the Turks against that unhappy country, as a favourable opportunity for her to extend her conquests to the Black Sea, and from thence to Constantinople.

What gave great countenance to this scheme, was the religion of the Russian empire. From the times of the emperor Justinian, who flourished about the middle of the sixth century, down to the middle of the fourteenth, the christians called Greeks, had settled themselves and propagated their religion from the eastern extremity of Dalmatia to the Hellespont, and in all the islands of the Mediterranean that lay eastward of Malta. They were likewise very numerous in the Lesser Asia; and from Armenia and Georgia, their sentiments had been inculcated among the Russians, so that the inhabitants of that vast empire were of the same religion with the greatest part of the inhabitants of Turkey in Europe. The Greeks, throughout every part of the Turkish empire, had been long considered in the same light as if they had been slaves; and the oppressions they groaned under, from the tyranny of their inhuman governors, the bashtaws of the provinces, made them wish for any change, especially such a one as might be in their favour.

All these things being duly considered by the empress of Russia and her ministry, it was agreed upon that her army should march into Poland, under pretence of assisting the dissidents. The regular troops of Poland were then under the command of count Branicki, master of the ordnance; but many regiments deserted, and joined the dissidents, who were now become so strong, that they took the field. Scarce a day passed without skirmishes between the contending parties; and while the diet of Poland was sitting, the Russians entered the senate-house, and carried off such of the members as were most averse to their measures. Confederacies were formed every where, according to the inclinations of the parties; but a body of them, under the marshal Potochi, was defeated by a party of the Russians, and obliged to seek shelter in Turkey. The Russians pursued the fugitives into Moldavia; which so exasperated the balhaw of that province, that he sent an express to the Grand Signior, who returned for answer, that the Russian general had infringed the faith of treaties, and insisted upon his making satisfaction. This, however, he would by no means comply with, and contented himself with pleading ignorance of the bounds of the Turkish empire; after which he retired, while Potochi harassed his rear, and cut off many of his men. Potochi soon after having gathered together the remains of his army, marched through Moldavia, and from thence into Poland, where he was joyfully received by his friends, and invited to join a strong confederacy that had been formed at Bar. There they were attacked by the Russians, and a most bloody battle ensued, in which the confederates came off conquerors, though not without considerable loss.

But this was a victory from which the confederates reaped but few advantages; for the Russian army, under general Apraksin, having attacked them, they were defeated, and above four thousand killed on the spot. The town and castle of Bar were then given up to the Russians, who seized all the arms and ammunition; and so vast were the riches deposited in these places, that the prizes to the private soldiers were near a thousand pounds sterling each.

At Cracovia, an ancient city in Poland, the confederates made a most vigorous defence, which was owing to the king having sent a most supplicating letter to the Russian general, not to demolish the houses of the inhabitants. However, a train of heavy artillery was sent from Warsaw, upon which the place was taken by storm, and many of the inhabitants put to the sword.

It might reasonably have been thought, that these distresses in Poland would have brought their great nobles to hearken to the voice of reason; but they were all to no purpose, for they seldom met together to transact public affairs, without coming to blows, and, on such occasions, much blood was spilt. The Greeks in the Morea having taken up arms, were defeated by a party of the Turks; and such as were taken prisoners suffered the most cruel tortures; all which furnished an excuse for the Russians to act with more vigour against the confederates in Poland, who had not only been instigated to take up arms by the Turks, but were also secretly supported by them, otherways they could never have been able to hold out so long as they did.

The connection which Great-Britain hath long had with Russia, of a commercial nature, makes us more than ordinarily concerned in every thing relating to that extensive empire. It is certain that the Russians could not long conceal their real intentions; and therefore the divan, or council of the Grand Signior, proposed that the ambassador from Petersburg should be imprisoned. This was a flagrant breach of the law of nations, which grants protection to the persons of ambassadors; but the Turks are either too ignorant, or too obstinate to pay any regard to such sacred rights. This occasioned an open declaration of war by the empress of Russia; and, from a manifesto which was transmitted to her ambassadors at foreign courts, it appears that she imagined all those in alliance with her would give her every assistance she should require; but this was what they would by no means comply with.

In the mean time, the empress raised a great army from all the different parts of the empire; and one out of ten of the regular troops was draughted, to teach the new-recruits military discipline; for some of them had been brought from the banks of the Wolga, where fire-arms had scarce ever been seen.

While these preparations were making in Russia, hostilities were renewed between the Russians and the confederates in Poland, and many bloody battles were fought; but the latter not being united, and less numerous than the former, were most commonly defeated with great loss. In one of these engagements, the Russians pursued a party of the confederates to the other side of the Borystenes, a river which divides Poland from the Turkish dominions; and the fugitives, having taken shelter in the town of Balta, in Lesser Tartary, the Russians took it by storm, and indiscriminately put all to the sword whom they found in arms, without so much as enquiring whether they were Turks, Tartars, or confederates. Nay, it is even asserted, that near a thousand women and children were barbarously murdered, which is not to be wondered at, when we consider what numbers of savage irregulars always attend the Russian armies.

This act of hostility enraged the Turks to the highest degree; and as their grand vizier, or prime minister, was of a very pacific disposition, he was deposed, and another appointed in his room. At the same time, a manifesto was given to such of the European ambassadors as were then at Constantinople. But it was one of the most foolish that ever was read: it sets forth, that the king of Poland was not fit to reign, because he was not of a royal family; altho' it is well known that the Poles had, time immemorial, elected one of their own nobles to be their king, nor had that practice been ever set aside till the death of the famous Sobieski, in 1697, when Augustus, elector of Saxony, was, by his intrigues, elected in his room.

The preparations made by the Turks for war, was, in some measure, similar to the conduct of Darius, when he went to meet Alexander the Great. The officers seemed to vie with each other in making the grandest provision of tents and equipages, and furnishing themselves with large sums of money; all which was joyful news to the Russians, who doubted not but they should be able to share in the spoils. Great bodies of troops from Egypt, Syria; and all parts of the Lesser Asia, were daily brought over the Hellespont; but many disorders having been committed by them in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, an order was issued, commanding all the new Asiatic troops to cross at the Dardanelles, where vessels would be ready to carry them to Gallipoly, on the opposite shore of the Black Sea. All the Greeks throughout the empire were ordered to deliver up their arms; but some of them, having refused to comply, the janisaries attacked them with their swords; and some on both sides were killed.

The eyes of all Europe were fixed on the emperor of Germany, to see what part he would take in the war: for although there had been long a natural enmity between his family and the Turks, yet he knew that the Russians were already too powerful to need any assistance, nor did he desire that they should ever settle on the Black Sea. However, the young emperor attended so strictly to the raising recruits to fill up his regiments, that many began to imagine that he intended to take the field; and it was even given out, that he was greatly offended because the Russians did not depart from Poland.

The king of Prussia, ever attentive to his own interest, did not remain idle; for his regiments were all completed, that he might be ready, on the first emergency, to take the field. He enlisted as many foreigners in his service as he could procure, lest agriculture should be neglected in his dominions. Nor was he less attentive to the domestic safety of his country; for he gave encouragement to all those who promoted manufactures; and rewards were bestowed on the widows and children of such as had been killed during the war.

The French, although professed Roman Catholics, pay but little regard to the pope; for this year they took from him the province of Vanaissan, with the fine city of Avignon. It is true, the pope thundered out his bulls and curses; but however terrible they might have been in former times, they were now very little regarded.

During the month of August this year, the French concluded a treaty with the republic of Genoa, of a very extraordinary nature, and such as ought to have been opposed by all the maritime states in Europe. The brave Corsicans still continued to defend those rights which the Genoese sought to deprive them of; and the latter despairing of ever bringing them into subjection, agreed to give up that valuable island to the French king, upon condition of his sending an army thither to subdue the people. It was really surprising that other nations should have suffered such a treaty to be put in execution; for if a war should break out, the French will have an opportunity of sending a swarm of privateers from Corsica, and to this island they could bring their prizes without being obliged to sail to Marseilles, so that the trade along the south and west coast of Italy would be wholly their own.

Such was the state of affairs on the continent, when the attention of the English ministry was directed to America, where several disturbances had happened on account of some duties having been laid on glass, salt, and some other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the stamp-act would have given some satisfaction to these people, but they still insisted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themselves.

At Boston, the people met in a large body, and entered into several resolutions not to import any goods of a superfluous nature; but to attend to the strictest economy, both in dress and furniture. A subscription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the establishment of new ones. This was done to elude the payment of the duties upon such articles as should be sent from England; and, at the same time, an association of gentlemen from all the old colonies was formed, in order to propose the most likely means to be used in preventing English acts of parliament from being put in force there, or in any other of the American provinces, or the West-Indies.

The freeholders, and, in general, all the inhabitants of Massachusetts Bay, had placed the greatest confidence in their representatives, and there was a continual contest between them and their governor. The earl of Shelburne had sent over a letter to the governor, complaining of these abuses, and it was read in the open assembly of the representatives. This occasioned most violent debates; and some of the members went so far as to declare, that the governor had misrepresented their conduct to the ministry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on that subject, vindicating themselves, and throwing the whole blame on the governor. At the same time, the merchants of Boston ordered their agent to represent to the lords of the treasury, that unless these duties, which had occasioned so much mischief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be destroyed, as they seemed to them contrary to the spirit of the constitution, and inconsistent with their charter. These representations occasioned the establishment of a new officer, who was to act as secretary of state for the colonies in America; and the first person made choice of was the earl of Hillsborough, at that time first lord of trade. The first thing done by his lordship, was to send circular letters to the governors of the provinces, informing them, that his majesty was highly displeased at the conduct of the people, as it was apt to create confusion, and throw every thing into the utmost disorder. He said, that their conduct in opposing the legislative power of Great-Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to such practices, the government would be overturned, and no regard paid to the laws. He concluded by recommending to them to preserve the public peace, by punishing all disorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere opposition in words, or in scandalous libels, they were to treat them with contempt.

Governor Barnard had dissolved the assembly of representatives, and new ones being chosen, it was insisted on by him, that they should make a public act to disapprove of the conduct of the late assembly. This was going too far; because, unless representatives are left free to act according to the will and orders of their constituents, they do not deserve the name. They desired to see a copy of the governor's instructions, which was granted them; and, to their surprise, they found, that in case they refused to comply, they were to be dissolved, and an account of their conduct sent to England, in order to be laid before the next sessions of parliament.

This set the whole assembly in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to pass a censure on the conduct of the last assembly, ninety-two voted against it, and no more than seventeen for it. The rest of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example, while combinations were formed almost every where not to take any goods from England, except such as were absolutely necessary.

The discontents among the people of Boston now broke out into open violence: for a ship having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any regard to the new laws by which the new customs were to be regulated, the officers made a signal to the Romney man of war, who sent her boats, and having cut down the masts of the trading vessel, hawled her along-side of the king's ship. This was so severely resented by the populace, that they rose in great numbers, demolished the houses of the custom-house officers, and laying hold of the commissioner's boat, dragged it on shore, and then set it on fire.

While these disorders continued in the town, the governor dissolved the assembly; but that had not the desired effect, for the disturbances increased every day, so that two regiments were sent over from Ireland to support the civil power. Their place of rendezvous was to be at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia; and no sooner had the people of Boston received news that they were landed at that place, than they met, and chose a president among themselves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reason, or with what view, his majesty's forces were to be sent among them. They desired, at the same time, that a general assembly might be summoned to meet; but he refused to give them any satisfactory answer, and only told them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and submit quietly to the laws. He added, that as they seemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he must freely tell them, that unless they submitted to the government, he should be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this time he refused to receive any messages from them; upon which they sent a long detail detail of their grievances to London, in order to be laid before the ministry. In the mean time, the transports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halifax, and were quartered in the houses of townsmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor that they should have barrack provisions, so as to be as little burthenome to the people as possible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general satisfaction to such of the people as were moderate in their sentiments; but notwithstanding, a great majority were still discontented. They could not behold without jealousy an armed force quartered amongst them in time of peace; for, with respect to their late combinations, they considered them as efforts to maintain their freedom.

The domestic peace of England, during this summer, which was not interrupted by any incident but one, which will hereafter be taken notice of, induced the king of Denmark to visit his royal brother-in-law, our sovereign. He was attended by most of his great officers of state, and the utmost respect was paid to him by all ranks of people. But nothing less than the most unbounded dissipation seemed to have taken place. His Danish majesty gave orders for a masquerade, which was one of the most magnificent ever seen in England; and while the preparations for it were going on, he visited Cambridge, where he was elegantly entertained in the hall of Trinity College. From thence he proceeded to York, Leeds, and Manchester; and, on his return to London, coming through Oxford, he was met by the whole university in procession. When he came to the senate-house, the public orator complimented him in a most elegant Latin speech, to which his majesty replied in the same language. He was then presented with a diploma, as doctor of the civil and canon laws, and walked in his honorary robes along with the doctors and regents. In the beginning of October, his majesty left England; and, much about the same time, several changes took place in the English ministry; for certain it is, that the political state of this country had, for several years, been of a very fluctuating nature.

In the East-Indies, during the latter end of the last, and the beginning of this year, things began to assume a new form; and it was even feared that a revolution would take place much to the disadvantage of the English East-India company, whose stock was now advanced to a surprising height. Hyder Ally, a person who had served some time as a common soldier, having received some affront from his officers, left the army, and raised a chosen band of followers, with a view of driving the English out of all their settlements in that part of the world. Although brought up in the most humble station, yet, like Tamerlane, or Caius Marius, he had all the qualities of a great general, which were only obscured for want of a proper opportunity of displaying them to public view.

Such was the character of the man with whom the English had now to contend, and it must be acknowledged, that it required the greatest skill to oppose him. He had conquered several provinces on the coast of Malabar, and, upon the whole, was considered as one of the most formidable princes in the east. He was sensible, however, that the East-India company would be so powerfully supported, that policy must be added to force, otherwise he should never be able to accomplish his schemes. Accordingly, he brought over the Nizam of the Decan to his interest; and having raised a large body of forces, prepared to take the field. Colonel Smith, in the company's service, was sent to oppose this formidable alliance; and a most desperate engagement ensued, in which Hyder Ally discovered all the courage and conduct of the bravest general. He made his dispositions with so much prudence, that it was no easy matter to attack him; so that colonel Smith, in order to avoid the force of his cannon, which galled the company's troops on the right, marched to a rising ground on the left, and so turned his lines. The Asiatic general rode from one place to another, to encourage his men; but at last they gave way, and the English continued pursuing them with great slaughter. All their cannon and ammunition fell into the hands of the English, besides a vast quantity of treasure; and the Nizam perceiving the danger he was in from his connections with Hyder Ally, made peace with the company. This, however, did not put an end to the war; for Hyder Ally finding himself deserted by the Nizam, transferred the seat of war into a mountainous part of the country, where it was extremely difficult to attack him, as he was well acquainted with all the passages and defiles; and could defend himself even against superiority of numbers.

During the latter part of this year, the war was carried on with great violence in Corsica: for altho' the French had landed there with a numerous army, the brave islanders disputed the ground with them inch by inch. Paoli had some hopes of assistance from England, and, for that purpose, sent notice of his distress to our ministry by one Mr. Boswell; a young gentleman with whom he had become acquainted while on his travels: but no assistance being given him, he had nothing to depend on besides the justice of his cause and the bravery of his countrymen. At first, the French obtained some considerable advantages; but the Corsicans killed such vast numbers of them in straggling parties, that had they not been reinforced by fresh succours continually sent to them, the whole army that first landed would have been totally cut off. The Corsicans concealed themselves in bushes and caves near the roads where the enemy were to pass, and galled them so much, that many of them deserted, while such as fell into the hands of the Corsicans as prisoners were instantly put to death. Some persons may be apt to blame the conduct of the Corsicans on this occasion, as inconsistent with the law of nations; but whoever does so, must be unacquainted with the peculiarity of their circumstances. They had been so much oppressed by the Genoese, that they had, consistent with the opinions of the best writers on natural law, asserted their own freedom; and when the republic of Genoa found that they could not again reduce them to a state of subjection, they gave them up to the French, as if they had been a parcel of sheep or oxen. The French, upon their landing in the island, commanded all the inhabitants to lay down their arms, and take an oath of allegiance to their sovereign, otherwise they were to be treated as rebels. Thus these innocent people, knowing that no mercy was to be shewn to such of themselves as were taken prisoners, resolved to treat the French in the same manner, and sell their lives and liberty as dear as possible. Such was the state of the Corsicans; and their putting the French prisoners to death was no more than an act of retaliation, which stands justified by Grotius, Budin, Locke, and Puffendorff.

Paoli, who still hoped for assistance from England, as well as from some of the other European powers, called an assembly of the Corsican chiefs, and asked their opinion concerning the most proper methods to be used in the prosecution of the war. He laid before them all the papers which the French had caused to be distributed throughout the island; but no sooner did the chiefs perceive that they were looked upon as vassals to the crown of France, than they tore them into a thousand pieces.

Although this campaign was but short, yet so great was the loss the French sustained, that, notwithstanding the new reinforcements which were daily sent them, they were on the point of being totally routed. Adjoining to Corsica are some small islands; and as the harbours of them were safe and commodious, so the Corsican privateers prevented, in a great measure, the enemy from receiving such supplies as had been sent sent them from France. This induced the French, in the month of November this year, to embark a considerable body of forces on board thirteen transports, in order to attack these small islands.

Their first attack was made on the island of Pietra; but although they made good their landing; they were repulged with great loss by a few Corsicans; who, animated by the love of liberty, fought like lions. From thence the French proceeded to Isola Rossa, another island, where the Corsicans kept their magazines, and attacked it with great fury. At first the Corsicans were driven from their posts; but no sooner had they recollected themselves, and recovered from their first surprize; than they faced about, and not only recovered the posts they had lost, but drove the enemy, with great slaughter, back to their ships. Above nine hundred of the French were killed in this fruitless expedition, and their general began to despair of ever taking the island. But we must now return to Britain.

The English ministry were thrown into a little confusion by the death of Mr. Townshend, chancellor of the exchequer, a gentleman of great natural parts, universal erudition, and a perfect knowledge of the constitution. Indeed, the ministry were far from being popular, and some parts of their conduct seemed to border on weakness; so that it was necessary that some person should be made choice of, who would be able, by a firmness of temper, to add some lustre to their fading characters.

In consequence of that resolution, lord North was made chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townshend paymaster of the forces, earl Gower president of the council, lord Weymouth one of the secretaries of state, and Mr. Rigby was appointed one of the vice-treasurers of Ireland. Several other changes took place; but as they were all of an inferior nature, and dependent on the above, they do not deserve a place in a work that only treats of general things, without defending to trifling particulars.

On the twenty-fourth of November, the parliament met, which, although their second sessions, was the first one in which they did any business of a national concern. In the speech from the throne, his majesty told the members of both houses, that his reasons for calling them together at so early a period, was to give them time for their public deliberations; and, in particular, it was recommended to them to promote our commercial interests in America, and other parts of the world, as the sole basis of all our riches. He told them, that it gave him no small concern to consider that the other powers in Europe had not attended to the articles of peace so strictly as was consistent with the faith of treaties; by which his majesty meant the conduct of the king of Prussia, in meddling with the affairs of Poland. He added, that other sovereigns might do as they pleased, but, for his part, he would take care that none should ever accuse him for the breach of treaties, these being of so sacred a nature, that they ought to be religiously adhered to. His majesty laid great stress on the conduct of the Americans; and it was even said that Boston was in an actual state of disobedience to all manner of government; that they had proceeded to measures subversive of the constitution, and attended with circumstances which manifested a disposition to throw off their dependence on Great-Britain. He concluded by recommending harmony among the members, as the only free way of promoting the national interest, both at home and abroad.

When the addresses were moved for, great debates arose in both houses, and many severe strictures were thrown out on the conduct of administration. The ministry were censured for suffering the French to take possession of Corsica, by which the commercial interests of Great-Britain would be much injured in the Mediterranean. It was likewise insinuated by the same party, that our commerce in Portugal had not been properly attended to; that our merchants had been injured in their property, and that many of our ambassadors at foreign courts spent the greatest part of their time in England.

To this it was answered by the partizans for the ministry, that addresses to the throne were no more than compliments of loyalty; that the least notice of such a measure as that of refusing to thank his majesty, would be circulated throughout all Europe, and give foreign courts a wrong impression of the British nation: that there was time enough, during the sessions, to enquire into the conduct of administration, and to censure such parts of it as should appear, in the least, exceptionable.

At last the addresses were presented in the same form as drawn up by the ministry; and his majesty was thanked, in the most grateful manner, for his attention to the state of Europe in general, and the commerce of Britain in particular. They told his majesty, that nothing should be wanting on their parts to establish the sovereign power of Britain over the colonies. The first thing done this session of parliament, was to bring in a bill to prevent the exportation of corn for a limited time, which, after long debates in both houses, passed into an act, to the great satisfaction of the poor in general.

A. D. 1769. On the nineteenth of January, the parliament met, after their adjournment during the holidays; and the first thing taken into consideration was the state of public affairs in America. A petition was presented, signed by Mr. Danforth, president of the council at Boston, praying that the revenue acts might be repealed. The petition was penned in the most modest manner, with a promise, that if these acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compensation, by taxing themselves. Great debates arose in both houses concerning the petition, those of the antiministerial party making use of the same arguments which had been urged in the debate concerning the stamp-act.

The lords agreed to address his majesty on the American affairs; and their resolution being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. By these resolutions it was declared, that all the acts made in the different colonies, which tended towards throwing off the sovereignty of the British parliament, were illegal, unconstitutional, and derogatory to the crown and dignity of his majesty. It was farther resolved, that the town of Boston was in a state of the utmost disorder and confusion, disturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obstructed in the discharge of their duty, and their lives endangered: that neither the council of the province, nor the ordinary magistrates, had exerted their authority for suppressing these riots and tumults; and that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the assistance of a military force to support the civil power, and protect the officers of the customs: that the resolutions of the town meetings in Boston were unconstitutional, and calculated to excite sedition and insurrection against the government. It was also agreed to by both houses, that all those who had written circular letters to the other colonies, were guilty of a high indignity to the crown, and that they had committed a daring insult on the legislative power of Great-Britain. In the end, his majesty was desired to issue a special commission, to enquire into the causes of these disorders, according to the statute 30th of Henry VIII. The debates on this occasion, with respect to his majesty granting writs of habeas corpus, to bring over the persons concerned in the riots, to be tried in England by virtue of special commissions, was strongly and learnedly opposed in both houses. It was said by those who opposed the bill, that the laws already made for the preservation of the British rights over the colonies, were so complete, that there was no reason for an amendment: that the ministry, having lost all credit with the people, wanted to make the cause of the Americans their own, by establishing their authority on the ruin of the colonies: that, with respect to bringing prisoners over from America, to be tried here for crimes supposed to have been committed there, was contrary to the spirit of the English constitution. A man charged with a crime in England, is usually tried in the county where it is said to have been committed; for this reason, that those who carry on the prosecution may have it in their power to produce proper evidence, and that the accused person may likewise be able to vindicate himself, if innocent. But if an American was brought over here to be tried, it would be next to impossible for him to produce one single witness, although he might be entirely innocent. If an American has committed any breach of the laws, let him be tried there, where justice can be done to both parties. It was farther urged, and represented as a strange measure on this occasion, to drag out of obscurity an obsolete law, which was a dishonour to the statute-books: that it was made during the reign of a tyrant, to serve the most arbitrary purposes, because our constitution of government had not then arrived at a state of perfection: that when the above act was made, we had not one colony in America, for it had then only been recently discovered; and that it would be much to the honour of the legislative power, to expunge from the records all such iniquitous statutes as that already mentioned: that it was the duty of all those in power to promote the interests of the people, both at home and abroad; but if the above measure was carried into execution, it would increase the seditions complained of in the colonies, and, consequently, injure the trade of the mother-country. They concluded by calling upon the ministry to produce the person who had advised his majesty to put the above act in force.

Such were the arguments made use of by those who opposed administration, and certainly they were very rational, and consistent with the spirit of our most excellent constitution. The ministry were so sensible of the error they had committed, that they became weak and languid in their answers. They referred back to the repeal of the stamp-act, and imputed all the troubles which had happened in America to the ill-judged lenity shewn on that occasion: that nothing but the vigorous use of coercive authority could ever reduce them to obedience, and convince them of the necessity of their dependence on the mother-country: that unless this measure was adopted, the most flagrant acts of treason and rebellion, with all other public crimes, might be committed with impunity: that such crimes had already been committed, and being attended with several circumstances of an aggravating nature, the perpetrators were not objects of compassion: that, with respect to there being no colonies in America when the act of Henry VIII. was made, it did not in the least apply to the argument in hand, for the act was made for the trial of all his majesty's subjects who should happen to commit crimes in any part of the world. For example; supposing a ship lying at anchor near an island not belonging to Britain, and two persons go on shore, fight, and one of them is killed; then, by the above act, a special commission is granted by the king for the trial of the offender, in whatever country he pleases. And, in proof of this doctrine, they mentioned an instance of a man of war lying at anchor in the Baltic, in 1720; and a quarrel happening between the lieutenant and the surgeon, they went on shore, fought, and the former was killed. Upon the ship's arrival in England, a special commission was granted for the trial of the surgeon, who being found guilty, was executed at Tyburn. They concluded by taking notice, that the revival of the act was not to promote punishment, but to preserve peace; and that the colonists, seeing the vigorous measures which the government intended to pursue, might be brought back to a sense of their duty. Such were the hopes of administration at that time; but experience, as will appear in the sequel, has convinced us, that they were wrong in their conjectures.

It is now necessary that we should attend to an affair that has made a considerable bustle, and, perhaps, will be looked upon by foreigners as a proof that our constitution is very much on the decline. We have already seen, that Mr. Wilkes retired to France, where he had not resided long, when a writ of outlawry was issued against him, while the commons expelled him from their house. This gentleman, who had acquired a large share of popularity, in consequence of the ministry's having singled him out as an object of their vengeance, and imprisoning him illegally, was accused of being the author of a poem of so blasphemous a nature, that no virtuous person would repeat a single line of it: but although it had the most dangerous tendency towards corrupting the morals of youth, yet the means made use of in procuring copies of it were so base, mean, and illegal, that those who hated the vices of the man abhorred the manner in which their fellow-subject had been treated.

Mr. Wilkes had, for some time, kept a printing-press in his own house; and having employed a poor, needy fellow, as a compositor, one of the under-secretaries of the treasury prevailed on him, for a trifling consideration, to steal one of the printed sheets of the poem in question. This was such a flagrant act of injustice, that almost all ranks of people condemned it, except those who were the perpetrators; for no man of honour or generosity will attempt to corrupt the servant of another person, for the mean purpose of being revenged for a supposed affront. The ministry did not fail to blast his character as much as possible; and, under such circumstances, an exile from his country, distressed in his circumstances, and, in a great measure, abandoned by his friends, Mr. Wilkes seemed not only ruined, but also forgotten: but when he found the parliament was dissolved, and that there might yet be some hopes of his getting the outlawry reversed, he came over to England, and offered himself a candidate to represent the city of London in parliament. There, however, he did not succeed; but seeming to rise superior to every misfortune, he addressed himself to the freeholders of the county of Middlesex, and was chosen their representative by a very great majority. Having succeeded thus far, he surrendered himself to the court of King's-bench, where, after many learned arguments by council on both sides, the court reversed the writ of outlawry, but, at the same time, committed him to prison for two years, as the author of a political paper called the North-Britain, and a poem intitled, An Essay on Woman. This seemed to be the last effort of ministerial vengeance; and the populace, who, though irregular, on many occasions, in their conduct, yet are generally compassionate, assembled in a body in St. George's Fields, to see the unfortunate prisoner. Whether they intended to rescue Mr. Wilkes, or whether they only went there to signify their resentment of the treatment he had received, certain it is, he gave them no encouragement; for he had not only voluntarily surrendered himself, but likewise, when he saw them at the gate of the prison, he advised them to disperse in a peaceable manner. This conduct of the populace was just what the ministry wished for, and therefore a detachment of the guards was sent to disperse them; but, as it commonly happens in such cases, several innocent persons lost their lives, among whom was a young man, the son of an inn-keeper, who had come there only from motives of curiosity.

As the parliament was not then sitting, Mr. Wilkes remained silent till the winter following, when happening to lay hold of a copy of the letter sent by the secretary of state to the chairman of the Surrey justices, he caused it to be published, together with an introduction written by himself. This gave great offence to those in power; and therefore Mr. Wilkes was brought to the bar of the house of commons, where he freely acknowledged that he had caused the letter to be published; upon which he was expelled the house, and a new writ issued for the election of a member to represent the county of Middlesex in his room.

But still the majority of the freeholders adhered to this man, whose cause was considered as that of the public. He was re-elected a second time by a majority greater than before; but that election being declared void, he was a third time elected, and again expelled. Those who wished well to the constitution, expected that this mode of election and expulsion would be continued till the end of the parliament; but a new and unheard of one was adopted.

A gentleman in the army was made choice of to offer himself a candidate for the county; and altho' Mr. Wilkes had a great majority, the house voted the military gentleman the sitting member, which most people considered as a subversion of the constitution. It was urged by those who opposed the measure, that the right of electors to chuse their own representatives was an essential and an inherent part of the constitution; that the house of commons, being composed of persons intrusted with delegated powers, they had no right to act in a judicative capacity; that the law of the land had regulated the qualifications of members to serve in parliament, and that Mr. Wilkes was not, by those laws, disqualified; that the house of commons has the right incidental to its judicative authority of declaring what incapacities are legal; but, at the same time, the house must take care in what manner it exercises that power, lest it should swell to an enormous height, and one branch of the legislative power assume to itself the privileges of the courts of law. It was further insisted on, that the power granted to the house in expelling members was already sufficiently great, for none called in question their privilege of expulsion; but then they had no right to hinder the electors to make choice of the expelled person as often as they pleased; nor was it consistent with the first and fundamental principles of our constitution, that the house should super-add to expulsion disqualification, because that would be an encroachment on the rights of freeholders, which they had enjoyed time immemorial; that reason cries aloud against such a power being lodged in any body of people whatever; and precedents were produced from the journals, to shew, that, till this time, the house had never assumed such a prerogative, nor was it believed they would suffer the present to take place after it had been duly considered.

These arguments were answered by the adherents of the ministry in the following manner. They said, that the house of commons had, time immemorial, a prescriptive right to expel their members; and that, unless the person expelled was, at the same time, rendered incapable of serving, expulsion would be no more than an open farce, by representing powers to have existed where they never had a being: that the right claimed by the freeholders of Middlesex stood reprobated in the eye of common sense and right reason, for they claimed a privilege to do wrong, by making choice of a person to represent them who had been declared incapable by the house, notwithstanding his being otherwise in the eye of the law: that if the house was obliged to receive all those who were returned by a majority, then the freeholders were equally obliged to return persons properly qualified, and not throw the drudgery upon the house of expelling members: that the law could not foresee every possible event, nor could it have been supposed that the freeholders would have acted in the manner they did, otherwise a law would have been provided: that our ancestors never imagined, or never intended, that blasphemers and infidels should be the guardians of our holy religion, nor beggars the protectors of those properties by which individuals subsisted: that the house of commons was, to all intents and purposes, a court of judicature with respect to controverted elections, and that this authority was derived from the first principles of our constitution. Did any other court possess this power, members might be obtruded upon the house who had no right to sit: that if the house did any thing which seemed to injure an individual, or even a collective body of people, then there could not be any other method of obtaining redress, than that of petitioning for a new statute to regulate all future elections.

If it is asked, Under what head of legal disability is the present expulsion to be found? The answer is easy; the records of parliament will inform those who have any doubts on their minds. Neither judges nor clergymen can sit in the house of commons; and for this reason, that, by an order of the house, they are rendered incapable. It was said, that a very extraordinary principle had been adopted in the course of this debate, as if the commons wanted to infringe on the liberties of the people; without recollecting that the commons and the people are virtually the same, and that any endeavour to make them separate bodies is no less dangerous than it is preposterous. If the commons, in their representative capacity, have privileges which render them important, that importance increases the consequence of the people in their capacity of delegation: the people cannot be secure, unless the commons are secure; they are inseparably connected, both in interest and freedom: and though, upon some occasions, the privilege of parliament may be a seeming oppression to individuals, the loss of it would be attended with very fatal effects to the whole community: that if the house of commons had not, in their collective capacity, a title to peculiar privileges, no member of the community could claim them with any degree of propriety; and yet individuals not only claimed such privileges, but were protected in the enjoyment of them by the laws of the land. That nothing could be more misrepresented, than by saying that this measure was an injury to the freeholders of the county of Middlesex; for, on the contrary, the injury was attempted by themselves, who would obtrude an improper person on the house as a member, and obstinately persevere in the attempt, though all England was open for them to make a proper choice: that the supposed violation of right, of returning a person with a manifest inferiority of votes, will vanish, if the subject is properly considered, and a liberal construction put upon the law: that those who obstinately persevere in voting for an unqualified person, are to be considered as not voting at all; their right of suffrage is acknowledged; but if the elector obstinately refuses to exercise this right according to law, he has only suspends his own right for the time, and his act being illegal, is, consequently, void: he suffers no injury, because he knows the consequence of what he does; and if he will indulge himself so far, it can never be called a hardship: that an unqualified, incapacitated person, can be no candidate, and therefore all votes given in favour of such a person must be null and void. Such were the arguments made use of by the ministry; and they, as well as the opposite party, sheltered themselves under precedents in former parliaments.

On the ninth of May, his majesty prorogued the parliament; and, in his speech, told them, that every part of their conduct gave him the greatest satisfaction. He applauded them in the warmest manner for having attended with so much care to the interests of the people, and the suppression of riots and tumults, which had been so frequent, not only in London, but in many parts of the country. He added, that he had done all he could to bring about a negotiation between the Turks and Russians, to no purpose; but he hoped the calamities of war would not extend to any other parts of Europe. He thanked the commons for having so generously contributed towards supporting the dignity of government; and promised, that, in the whole of his conduct, he would attend to the most regular œconomy. Finally, he concluded concluded by recommending to them to promote peace among their neighbours, so that public justice might not be obstructed; and that a proper regard should be paid to the laws.

Such was the internal state of Great Britain during the former part of the year, which naturally leads us to take notice of the affairs of the continent.

In Poland, the inclemency of the season had, for some time, prevented the contending parties from coming to action, by which the poor distressed inhabitants, who were all divided against each other, had time for a small respite.

The Turks had posted an army of six thousand men near Bender, to prevent the Russians from making incursions beyond the Ukraine, while their grand army was assembled in the neighbourhood of Adrianople; from whence parties were dispatched to guard the coasts of the Black Sea. The Turkish troops, many of whom had come from the warmer climates of Asia, were extremely sickly; and as their commanders doubted not but the Russians would avail themselves of such a circumstance, by attempting to bring on a winter campaign, they ordered all the bridges to be broken down, and the provisions to be removed. This was a most fatal stroke for the Russians; who, in consequence thereof, were deprived of the means of subsistence, and reduced to the greatest hardships. The kan of the Tartars having broken through the Russian lines, entered the province of New Servia, and committed the most horrid depredations on the innocent inhabitants; but the fatigues he underwent put an end to his life, which was a great loss to the Turks; for he was a man who had a perfect knowledge of military discipline, and was capable of conducting the greatest army whatever.

About this time the confederates of Bar in Poland took the field, assisted by several regiments of Turkish janizaries, and the whole began to make a very formidable appearance; but the Russians, who had the advantage of discipline, attacked them with such order and regularity, that they were defeated with great slaughter, and obliged to cross the Niefter with the loss of their cannon, and such magazines as they had formed.

In Constantinople, the greatest preparations were making for opening the campaign, and as the grand vizier was to take the field, the standard of Mahomet was to be displayed. Previous to this ceremony, a proclamation was issued, commanding all Christians, under pain of death, not to look at this celebrated banner. But notwithstanding this violent prohibition, yet it was impossible to prevent every one from seeing it; for it is a common observation, that curiosity is stimulated by restraint.

The wife and daughter of the sieur Bronyard, ambassador from Vienna, disdained the thoughts of giving up their Christian freedom to Mahometan bigotry, and therefore placed themselves at a window opposite to where the procession was to pass. They were soon taken notice of by the Turks, who flew into the most violent rage, and in an instant the ambassador's house was surrounded. The servants, who were well provided with fire-arms, made a most vigorous defence; and a dreadful fray ensued, in which several persons were killed, but the mob being numerous, they broke into the house, and laying hold of the ambassador's lady, were going to strangle her, had not a party of Janizaries arrived to assist her.

The grand vizier, who was a man of knowledge and generosity, expressed great sorrow for the insult that had been offered to the lady; and told the ambassador that he hoped he would impute it to the real cause, namely, the blind fury of an ignorant rabble, who could not be brought under proper restraints.

He assured him, at the same time, that he should have all the reparation that was possible, and soon after the vizier sent a present of jewels to his lady with a bag, containing the heads of the three principal rioters. Nor was the grand seignior himself less complaisant to the ambassador, for he sent his own interpreter to make an apology for the indignity offered him; and, at the same time, delivered him a rich present. This part of the conduct of the vizier and seignior does great honour to their good sense, and may serve to convince us in this island, where we esteem ourselves for our politeness, that generosity, benevolence, and all the other virtues are to be found among those, whom we are too apt to consider in the same light as barbarians.

The Turkish army had been long incumbered with women, a practice that has existed time immemorial in the eastern countries; but the grand vizier, who had the most enlarged sentiments concerning the duty incumbent upon him as a vicé-roy, ordered them all to be sent home, well knowing that they would, in a great measure retard the military operations.

In the mean time prince Gallitzin, who commanded the Russian army on the banks of the Neister, thought this a proper time to attempt something decisive, before the Turkish army should arrive. Accordingly having crossed that river, he marched to Choczim, where he encamped in sight of a body of thirty thousand Turks, under the command of Caran Pacha, who were strongly entrenched under the cannon of that town. In the beginning of April the prince made the necessary disposition for attacking the Turks in their entrenchments; and notwithstanding a most vigorous defence, he drove them from all their advanced posts, and obliged them to take shelter within the pallisades of the fortress. The fire was so violent from the Russian artillery, that the greatest part of the town was reduced to ashes; while the Jews and Christians, who lived in it, having abandoned their most valuable effects, made their escape out of one of the posterns, and took refuge among the Russians, rather than give themselves up to the inhuman barbarity of the Turks.

The Russians began to form great hopes from this successful event; but in the midst of their rapid progress, they were obliged to retreat and cross the Neister, while the Turks harraressed them in the rear with unremitting fury. The circumstances of this retreat were so extraordinary, that the Russians did not so much as attempt to guard the passages of the river, and the Turkish cavalry over-run the neighbouring provinces, burning and destroying all the houses where the Russians had deposited their stores and provisions. A most pompous account of this affair was published at Constantinople, and the grand seignior went in public procession to the mosque to return thanks to heaven, where the mufti or chief priest bestowed upon him his solemn benediction, and invested him with the title of conqueror. It is true, hyperbole, or an extravagant use of words, has long been the custom of the eastern nations, and consistent with sound policy it may, in some measure, be justified; for such exaggerated accounts fill the minds of the vulgar with surprize, and keep them in proper subjection to government.

In the mean time, general Romanzow, who commanded a part of the Russian army, made an attempt on the important fortress of Oczakow, the capital of the Budziac Tartary, where the great river Boristhenes falls into the Black Sea; a place of great importance, because it opens a communication with the mouth of the Danube, and with several Turkish European provinces. The place was strong both by nature and art, and in it was a garrison of about twenty thousand Turks, so that notwithstanding the Russian general attacked it with great fury, yet he was obliged to raise the siege, and in his retreat was so much harraressed by the Turks, that he lost a great number of men. This action, though no way very considerable, was represented at Constantinople as a most signal victory, and great rejoicings were made upon it. The common people were told that the Russians were almost totally defeated; which had such an effect upon their minds; that had they not been restrained by the civil power, they would have put to death all the Christians in that city.

In the mean time, the grand Turkish army moved slowly, and the grand vizier had many difficulties to encounter, for it was no easy matter to bring an army under proper rules of discipline; that had been collected from above fifty different nations. In general they either hated or despised each other, some valuing themselves on the courage that their ancestors had displayed in the field of battle, while others had nothing to boast besides that of their being born in the fertile plains of Syria, or the romantic mountains near the Caspian sea. Nor was it much better with the officers, for they were continually quarrelling among themselves, and on many occasions refused to obey their orders. The Janizaries, a sort of militia, though the standing army of the Turkish empire, had been always accustomed to set the example to the other troops of obeying their officers and fighting in defence of their court; but now they became so licentious, that discipline was trampled under foot, and the whole army exhibited one scene of riot and disorder.

During the continuance of these disorders, the grand vizier acted like a man of wisdom and prudence; for confiding in the power that was reposed in him, he insisted that every soldier in the army should attend to his duty, or be punished in the most exemplary manner. In the mean time, he knew that nothing would be more dangerous than to suffer an irregular undisciplined army to engage with the veteran forces of Russia; and therefore he ordered several detachments to advance in the front, that they might learn the art of war by skirmishing with the enemy. Such was the conduct of the grand vizier, and those who have read the Roman history must acknowledge, that it was not inferior to any thing performed by the great Fabius, when he was sent to oppose Hannibal. Great abilities are often concealed under the covert of supposed ignorance; but all mankind being by nature the same, the latent seeds of knowledge will break forth notwithstanding every opposition.

While the Turkish vizier was going on in this prudent manner, prince Gallitzen was making preparations for crossing the Niefter; and for that purpose he detached general Rennecamp with a considerable body of forces to divert the attention of the enemy on the other side of the river. This measure had the desired effect; for the Russian army having marched a few miles to the south, crossed the river without the least molestation.

Before the Turks were aware, the Russians attacked them with great fury, while the Turkish army did all they could to defend themselves; but discipline overcame numbers, and the Russians drove them once more to their entrenchments under the walls of Choczim. This victory was owing to the bravery of the Russian infantry, who stood immovable, and proceeded gradually as the Turks retreated, killing them in great numbers. During all these misfortunes the grand vizier did not despair; he knew that his army was, for the most part, an undisciplined rabble; but he knew that action would bring them into exercise, and therefore he resolved to persevere in his duty.

Whenever the Turkish arms are not successful, those who command them are sure to be disgraced, if not executed, and the more elevated their rank, the greater their danger. Thus the grand vizier, who had hitherto acted with great prudence, and gone great lengths in establishing military discipline, fell a sacrifice to misguided fury, and Ali Pacha Moldavini, a man of a most violent temper, was appointed his successor. Many other changes took place both at court and in the army; and while the vizier Carman Pacha went to meet him in the most humble and respectful manner, but for some secret grudge that the vizier had against him, his head was ordered to be cut off. The unfortunate bassaw endeavoured to retire, and for his own safety drew his sword, but he was soon surrounded by numbers and cut in pieces.

In the mean time his felictar or sword-bearer, fired with indignation at the fate of his master, drew out a pistol and aimed the shot at the head of the vizier, who would have been shot, had not one of his faithful domestics saved his life at the expence of his own. The felictar was soon overpowered and cut in pieces, and both their heads cut off and exposed, according to the Turkish custom, on the front of the grand vizier's tent. From the fate of these two brave men, we may learn that the Turks, although not such barbarians as they were when they conquered that extensive empire, yet they are still far from being a polished people.

General Romanzow committed great ravages in the neighbourhood of Bender, where he burnt and plundered several towns and villages; defeated a detachment of Turks, and drove off a great booty of cattle. The Tartars also committed great ravages in Poland, where they almost totally destroyed the palatinate of Bricklaw, besides doing much mischief in other places. In the beginning of September the Russians lay encamped on the banks of the Niefter, and defended the passage of that river against the Turks, whose whole army, under the new vizier, arrived on the opposite banks.

The vizier next night ordered a detachment of his best troops, consisting of eight thousand, to cross the river, a few miles below, and attack the Russians in flank. This they did, and for some time the battle was extremely furious; but at last the Turks were obliged to retreat across the river, after losing four thousand of their best troops.

The sending detachments across rivers where a great army is encamped, is a strong proof that the vizier was utterly destitute of skill in military affairs; for how could he expect that they would be able either to oppose the Russians, or to retreat, seeing there was no communication between them and the main army but by crossing the river. Indeed the vizier was too rash and obstinate to hearken to the advice of his officers; for as his predecessor had been displaced for being too cautious, he resolved to succeed by an opposite extreme.

In consequence of a resolution bordering on madness, the vizier ordered three bridges to be laid across the Niefter, and began to cross that river in sight of the whole Russian army. Prince Gallitzen suffered a considerable number of them to cross, and then about seven o'clock on the morning of the ninth of September, he attacked them with his infantry in three square columns, and the battle was obstinately disputed till noon, when the Russians pushed on so furiously, with their bayonets fixed, that the Turks were obliged to give way.

It must be acknowledged that the Turks behaved with great bravery, but such was the ignorance and obstinacy of the vizier, that he never considered the nature of the ground, so that his men were taken in both flanks before they could possibly form, and in the battle and retreating across the bridges, the flower of their best troops were destroyed. Seven thousand Turks were left dead on the field, besides those that were wounded and taken prisoners; and a great number were drowned in crossing the river.

This dreadful carnage, the signal and immediate punishment of folly and rashness, would have struck any mind, except that of the vizier's. It seems unaccountable that the soldiers, who were so turbulent and ungovernable under the late vizier, should now bear the continual destruction that attended this extravagant conduct, without flying into any act of extremity. It may, however, serve to shew that there is nothing an army will not attempt or endure for a general who keeps the soldiers warm in continual action; if, at the same, he directs his conduct in such a manner as seems consistent with real courage, though some degree of prudence may be wanting.

The vizier, not in the least dispirited by his loss, laid one bridge only across the river, and had the precaution to cover it with several batteries of cannon, his resolution being to cross the river with the whole army, let the consequences be what they would. This was such a bold attempt, that we scarce find an instance in history parallel to it; and had it been mixed with prudence, the name of this vizier would have been much more respectable than it is.

Four thousand cavalry, with eight thousand janizaries, had already crossed the river, and with them was a large train of artillery; and the rest of the army was in motion to follow them, when a sudden swell of the river carried away the bridge. Thus were twelve thousand brave men inclosed by the Russian army in the front, and the river now rendered impassable in the rear, without time or an opportunity of entrenching themselves.

The Russians seeing them in such a deplorable situation, resolved to avail themselves of so favourable an opportunity. An engagement, truly desperate, ensued, in which the Russians fought like men who were assured of success, while the Turks resolved to sell their lives as dear as possible. The severity of the Turkish manners, which has not admitted of the civilized and humane custom of exchanging prisoners, prevented a capitulation from being desired, or any proposals for laying down their arms. The battle was severe, and the slaughter prodigious. About three hundred, out of twelve thousand, escaped by swimming, the rest being either killed in the field, drowned in the river, or taken prisoners. Sixty-four pieces of cannon were taken, with one hundred and fifty standards; and, for several miles, nothing was to be seen but dead bodies.

The agitation of mind which the Turkish forces must suffer, who were the unhappy spectators, on the opposite shore of the river, of the cruel slaughter of their friends, may possibly be conceived, but cannot be described. Perhaps, to a feeling, tender mind, the momentary agony was more severe to him who was the looker on, than to the immediate sufferer. While the bloody contest continued, the whole army was buried in silence; but when the slaughter was finished, and all hopes lost, they expressed their rage and grief in the bitterest cries and lamentations; at the same time, imprecating the most bitter curses on the vizier.

In the midst of their rage and despair, they broke up the camp; and throwing off all obedience to their leaders, abandoned the strong fort of Choczim, and retired, in a tumultuous manner, towards the Danube. Immediately prince Gallitzin sent a detachment to take possession of the place, and there they found the whole of the stores and ammunition belonging to the Turks; for such was the terror they were thrown into, that they never once thought of securing or destroying them.

Prince Gallitzin having placed a garrison of four regiments in the fort, under the command of count Romanzow, who, at the same time, was to remain commander in chief of the army till his return, set out for the court of Petersburg, to receive the thanks of his royal mistress. Another army of Russians over-ran the province of Moldavia, and took possession of the capital of Jassy, situated on the river Pruth, about one hundred miles eastward of Choczim.

While the war was carried on in this manner between the Turks and Russians, the pope died at Rome in a very advanced age, and was succeeded by cardinal Ganganelli, who assumed the name of Clement XIV. He had been brought up, from his most early youth, for the church; and, to an universal acquaintance with learning in general, he had added moderation in his conduct; and was an enemy to all combinations among princes, which tend to prolong civil disturbances. He endeared himself to the people of Rome, by issuing orders for lowering the prices of provisions; and he suppressed the custom, so long in use with his predecessors, to oblige all foreign ambassadors to kiss their toe.

A.D. 1770. In England, during the preceding summer, several remonstrances had been presented to the throne, complaining of an undue election of a member for the county of Middlesex; but all the answer the remonstrance received was, that his majesty would do nothing without the consent of his parliament. That the ministry might be supported effectually, it was resolved on in council to adhere to their grand scheme, the Middlesex election, as a perpetual rule of policy. "Besides," said they, "if the subjects are permitted to go on in this manner, remonstrating against the conduct of their own representatives, we shall be sure of a majority in parliament."

While the minds of the people in general were agitated in considering what would be the event of these things, both houses of parliament met; but not the least notice was taken of the remonstrances in the speech from the throne, which surprised people still more; but then it was considered, that the ministry had determined to add fortitude to their conduct, whether it were right or wrong.

Some notice was taken of foreign affairs, particularly the state of the war between the Turks and the Russians; but the principal things insisted on by his majesty, were the following, namely, the distracted state of America, and the distemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the strongest terms, recommended to their serious attention, as a thing of the utmost importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a most dreadful calamity to the nation in general; and it was recommended to every one to exert themselves in endeavouring to put a stop to the infection, before it should spread any farther.

This speech was severely handled by the public in general, who thought that nothing should have been so much touched on as the petitions and remonstrances. Ridicule was circulated with great freedom, especially as the existence of the distemper among the horned cattle was not believed to be of so universal a nature as had been insinuated and represented.

It was immediately moved by the ministry, that an address should be presented to the throne; upon which a most violent debate arose, and it was carried on with a heat of temper and severity of expression scarce ever known in the house before.

It was insisted by those who opposed the ministry, that, in the address, it should be recommended to his majesty to take into consideration the grievances of the people. On the other hand, the existence of those pretended was denied, and all the discontents among the people were ascribed to the conduct of those gentlemen who had been disappointed in their ambitious views. It was farther urged, that even allowing grievances to exist, as stated in the remonstrances, yet the methods used in seeking redress had been very indecent and unbecoming: that not one tenth of the freeholders, and but very few of the clergy or justices of the peace, had signed these petitions; and although there might be some respectable names found to them, yet the whole could be considered in no other light than as the act of a rabble.

Such were the outlines of the arguments made use of by those who stood up in defence of administration; and many virulent epithets were thrown out on the other party, whom, in derision, they called Petition-hunters. These charges drew from the gentlemen in the opposition a spirited avowal of the part they had taken in respect to the petitions, and of the sentiments they delivered to their constituents. They insisted, that they were under obligations to give an account of their conduct in parliament to their constituents, and to give them the most early notice of every measure adopted by the court, that might, in the least, threaten the subversion of their rights and privileges:

privileges. That in the present instance, they had not hunted after petitions, for the petitioners had sought them, and had charged them with their commands, which they were bound to deliver. It had been insinuated by some of the ministry, that these meetings were seditious; but those in the opposition treated the expression with every term of ridicule, and threw back the charge, by calling every meeting of the ministry these two years, no better than a seditious one; because in them were laid schemes for trampling on the rights of the subjects. These debates, which were carried on with too much heat by both parties to bring any honour to the speakers, being ended, the address was voted for and carried by a great majority.

Before any business of importance was undertaken, some very remarkable changes took place in the ministry. The seals were taken from lord Camden, and the honourable Charles York was created chancellor in his room, but he died within three days afterwards; and then the chancery was put into commission, the seals being delivered to baron Smyth, and the justices Bathurst and Aston. The marquis of Granby resigned all his places, except the royal regiment of blues, and was succeeded as master of the ordnance by general Conway. The duke of Beaufort resigned the place of master of the horse to the queen; the earl of Huntingdon his place of groom of the stole; and the duke of Manchester, with the earl of Coventry, their places of lords of the bedchamber. Mr. Dunning, the solicitor-general, and Mr. Grenville, one of the vice-treasurers of Ireland, resigned at the same time. The whole of the administration seemed to be falling in pieces, a general panic prevailed; but the court, resolute to its purpose, was determined to fight the battle notwithstanding the desertion of so many of its principal commanders. Sir John Cust, speaker of the house of commons, resigned at the same time; but that was owing to his age and infirm state of health. In his room was elected Sir Fletcher Norton, a gentleman who had made a very distinguishing figure at the bar, and who had lately been advanced to a most valuable sinecure.

Within a week after these changes had taken place, the duke of Grafton, to the astonishment of the whole nation, resigned the place of first lord of the treasury, and was succeeded by lord North, who had been some time chancellor of the exchequer. Various were the causes assigned by the public for this act of the duke's, some attributing it to fear, and others to treachery; but as he still continued to support all the measures of government, it appeared evident that the sole reason was, the necessity of having one of the members of the house of commons to be at the head of public affairs.

The first thing that came before the commons was an enquiry into the validity of the Middlesex election; but after warm debates it was held, by a considerable majority, that no court of law was to meddle with any of their rules and orders. This measure astonished the whole nation, and many persons began to look upon the house of commons as a standing council for the crown. Nor was this important subject agitated with less heat in the house of lords. The earl of Chatham with lord Camden, and many other peers, opposed it with great strength of argument, and produced proofs from many of our law books and parliamentary journals, that no such step had ever been taken, not even in the most despotic reigns. But notwithstanding the force of these arguments, ministerial interest prevailed, and the proceeding of the house of commons, in the affair of the Middlesex election, were all just and equitable.

A motion was made to bring in a bill to disqualify certain officers of the revenues from voting for members of parliament. It was said by those who supported the motion, that at the revolution the produce of the customs and excise were both extremely small, nor was there at that time any probability that they would ever amount to the enormous sum of six millions sterling, as they then actually did. To this they attributed the inattention of the patriots of that age, who, if they had foreseen the unconstitutional weight that must have been thrown into the scale on the side of the crown, by the appointment of officers to collect so vast a revenue, they would undoubtedly have taken proper and effectual measures to prevent the dangerous influence which it must afford, in the election of representatives for the people.

On the other side it was urged, that the bill was altogether unnecessary, and in its own nature extremely cruel. That it was no less than the disfranchising a great number of men who had long enjoyed that privilege, and as the motion then stood, it might extend to all the officers under the crown. It was added, that no evidence had been so much as suggested of any undue influence used by the crown, and therefore the motion was rejected by a very great majority.

The popular party, having lost this motion, desired that all the papers, containing a list of the expences of government, should be laid before them. It was said in support of the motion, that the civil-list revenue if misapplied; instead of maintaining the dignity of the crown, served only to besiege it with parasites, and in the place of promoting arts and industry, to subvert the liberties of the people. That though the funds allotted for this purpose were fully adequate, not only to every necessary, but to every liberal expence, that was necessary to support the dignity of the regal character; yet neither the greatness of the fund, nor the confessed œconomy of the times, were sufficient to prevent an enormous debt from being contracted, and the people from being applied to for more money, at a time when men in the kingdom were of opinion that too much had been granted already.

That necessary expences had been much more considerable in the latter reign than the present, because the branches of the royal family were then grown up, and consequently demanded larger allowances. The journeys to the continent, however expedient, were frequent, and at all times expensive; and none would pretend to say, that magnificence was not as well understood, and perhaps better supported, than at present; yet his late majesty not only lived within the bounds of the civil-list, but a sum of one hundred and seventy thousand pounds wholly saved from that revenue.

That it was neither intended nor wished, to limit the crown to a salary inadequate to its real dignity and greatness; for if it should appear that the money had been spent in promoting useful purposes, those who made the motion will be the first to give their approbation. But if on the contrary, it should appear that the money had been squandered away among time-serving wretches, who sought to ruin their country; then those who advised such measures should be called to a severe account.

To this it was answered by those who stood up for the ministry, that if an application had been now made for an additional sum to make good any deficiency in the civil-list establishment, an enquiry into the causes of it would be natural and justifiable; and it would be but reasonable, that the ministry, in such a circumstance, should give the utmost satisfaction to the people; say, that it was even their duty to do so, and shew the reasons why the provision already made was not sufficient; but till such a requisition was made, it would be improper and very disrespectful to the crown, to scrutinize into the manner in which the money for the support of the royal family had been expended. It was urged farther, that a certain sum of money was allowed annually for the support of the civil-list, and while the expences do not exceed that sum, there can be no reason for making any enquiry. They concluded by taking notice, that as the civil-list was the property of the crown, his majesty had a right to dispose of it in whatever manner he he pleased. At last, the vote being put, the motion, like all others opposed by the ministry, was rejected by a great majority.

This affair, which had made no small noise out of doors, being over, the next thing was to take into consideration the state of the colonies in America. A petition had been presented by the merchants trading to North-America, setting forth the great hardships they laboured under in consequence of an act, by which a duty had been laid on some trifling articles exported from Great-Britain; and this had so much enraged the people, that they refused to purchase the goods, after they had been sent there at a considerable expence. This affair being of a very serious nature, the house took it into consideration, and repealed every part of it, except what related to tea, which was still continued. The debates concerning this bill were managed by great force of argument on both sides, for the popular party fought a repeal of the whole, while the ministry insisted, that the Americans, instead of deserving any such indulgence, ought to have had more severe laws binding upon them.

While the greatest part of the nation was agitated by reflecting on the consequences that would result from these measures; while individuals were seeking to promote their private interests, and the government to establish its authority, a bill was brought into the house of commons by one of the leading men in the opposition, for regulating the proceedings on controverted elections; a bill equally just and popular, and which all the subjects of Great-Britain were more or less concerned. It will be proper to make the reader acquainted with the nature of this bill, that he may be the better able to judge of its utility, and how far such a law was, in a manner, absolutely necessary.

It had been the custom formerly in all contested elections; to refer the matter to a select committee of the most learned and upright members in the house; and, in general, their opinion was seldom called in question; but in time the committees had been enlarged, and all who came in having votes, a shameful partiality prevailed; which in the end induced those, who thought themselves injured, to apply for remedy at the bar of the house.

This method, however, was found to be very defective; and attended with many inconveniences, owing principally to the vast number of those who were to try the cause in dispute; and who, besides being biased by the ties of private friendship, were not bound by any oath to prevent such influence from operating on their minds.

At the same time, the method of trying these causes at the bar became an obstacle to many branches of public business, especially in the last sessions of a new parliament, when there was scarce time to attend to any thing else. It was at the same time very disagreeable to the members themselves, who were continually teased with applications in favour of both candidates, that they would give their attendance, and although it was not said that they were to vote contrary to truth and equity, yet their attendance was considered as equivalent to their approbation. To all this it may be added, that as the ministry have always a majority on their side to support them in all their measures, so if they chuse to stand up in defence of any one of the candidates, they can, by promises and threatenings, get a sufficient number to vote him the fitting member.

To remedy these defects this bill was brought in, and the plan of it was consistent with the first principles of the constitution. When a petition was to be presented, a day was to be fixed for hearing both parties, who were to attend with their witnesses and council; and if one hundred members were not present, then they were to wait till such time as so many were present; when the names of the whole, altho' they should exceed that number, were to be put into six boxes or glasses, to be drawn alternately and read by the speaker, till forty-nine are chosen; the fitting member and the petitioner being allowed to chuse one each. Lifts were then to be given to the fitting member, the petitioner, councils, witnesses, &c: who, with the clerk, were to withdraw, and strike off one alternately till the number should be reduced to thirteen; who, with the two named by the parties, were to make a committee to determine the affair in dispute. Such was the nature of this new bill, and it must be acknowledged that nothing could be more just or equitable for the freedom of elections, and every measure used to prevent corruption and bribery must at all times be the life of the British constitution.

While the house of commons were engaged on this grand subject, the city of London met in their common-hall, and agreed upon another petition, address and remonstrance, for redress of their pretended grievances in the affair of the Middlesex election. In this address it was expressly declared, that the house of commons had acted in the most unconstitutional manner, and therefore they prayed that they might be dissolved; that the people might be left at liberty to make a free choice. In answer to this, his majesty told them, that he had never done any thing but by the advice and consent of his parliament, and therefore he could not comply with their request.

Violent disputes arose in parliament on this affair, and many opprobrious expressions were made use of on both sides. It was said that the citizens of London were the support of the government on every occasion; that it had been the custom, time immemorial, to consult them on the most important matters; to which the ministry answered, that no affront had been offered to the citizens of London, nor any thing denied them, except such as was in its own nature improper to be granted.

It is now necessary that we should take some view of the affairs of Ireland, which for some time had been thrown into great confusion, in consequence of a bill being brought in and passed, by which a new parliament is to be elected every eight years. From the Revolution down to the year 1769, the parliaments of Ireland continued till the death of the king; so that the members became a standing council to administration, while the people were deprived of their privileges. One would have thought that an act of so popular a nature as that of having frequent parliaments, would have met with the approbation of all ranks of people; but in many instances the reverse took place.

Many of those who had been long in parliament considered themselves as injured, because they had been made to believe, that they should not vacate their seats till the death of the king. These brought over all their dependents to second them, but their resentment was concealed for some time. When the new parliament met nothing but harmony was to be seen among the members, and the lord-lieutenant was treated with every mark of respect: but this good humour was of short continuance.

The lord-lieutenant, according to orders received from the ministry, thought this a fair opportunity for bringing in a bill for the augmentation of the forces, which had failed of success at the breaking up of the last parliament. Accordingly, a message was sent, recommending this measure in the strongest terms from the throne, as a matter his majesty had much at heart, for the honour of the crown and the safety of the kingdom.

This augmentation was to consist of private men only, without any additional officers; and it was proposed further, that as soon as the old staff officers died, no more new ones should be appointed, except one commander in chief, and five generals. Great opposition was made to this bill, for it was alledged that such a requisition was unnecessary in time of profound peace; that the military establishment in that kingdom was already too expensive, while the nation was loaded with taxes to support them, that although the nation paid for twelve thousand effective men for the security of the state, yet above four thousand of these were abroad in different garrisons. It is impossible to express the warmth of contention that arose between the court and the popular party.

It was considered as a most odious measure, that a bill brought into the house of commons in Ireland should have been framed by the privy-council in England. It is true, there is a law for that purpose, commonly called Poyning's act; but as it was made in the arbitrary and tyrannical reign of Henry VII. so all sober men thought that in this enlightened age, it ought to have been set aside.

It was urged further, that this was a money bill, with which the privy-council of England had nothing to do. Nay, they could not meddle with such things, even in their own country. That money could only be raised by the representatives of the people, and it was known to every one that no body of men were represented by the privy-council, they themselves being taxed in parliament by every new bill, which becomes binding on them as well as on the rest of the subjects.

Those who stood up for the ministry in support of the bill had very little to say, for they saw that they had begun the bill in a very improper manner. Had it originated in the Irish house of commons, there is reason to imagine that the bill would have passed; but the clamour was so great that it was rejected by a very great majority.

But notwithstanding the bill was rejected, yet the commons voted the most liberal supply for the support of the civil-list, and all other expences attending the government. The lord-lieutenant was so much disappointed at the loss of his favourite bill, that he went to the house of peers and entered a formal protest against it, as an act of disobedience to the privy-council. He then made a long speech from the throne, after which he prorogued the parliament. Some suspicions that the lord-lieutenant was going to prorogue the parliament had taken place a week before, and those lords who had opposed his measures, made a motion, that no protest should be entered in the journals, unless signed by a lord of parliament. This occasioned a most violent debate; but the motion being rejected by a small majority, the minority entered a protest against it. The house of commons, previous to their breaking up, forbid the lord-lieutenant's speech from being entered in the journal's.

Such were the proceedings in this first session of the first limited parliament. No business had passed, except that of granting the common supplies. All the national business was left undone; the temporary acts, which are either altered or reversed every year, whether relative to agriculture, trade, the preservation of the public safety, the supplying the capital with provisions, and the support of public charities, were now at an end. The whole kingdom was filled with the utmost consternation, discontents took place every where, and nothing but confusion was to be seen.

This affair being of the utmost importance, a motion was made in the English house of commons, that all the instructions sent to the lord-lieutenant should be laid before the house. In the debates on this subject, the conduct of the lord-lieutenant was treated with particular marks of severity; for it was said, that he had cajoled the parliament of Ireland out of a considerable sum, and then prorogued them before they had time to enter on the national business. It was added further, that the English parliament was called upon by every motive of justice and humanity, to enquire into the state of our sister kingdom, and to grant them that redress which their own parliament could not.

On the other hand it was urged, that a controuling power must be lodged somewhere. That Poyning's law had lodged that controuling power in the king and council, and as the Irish house of commons had refused to obey that law, the lord-lieutenant was under the necessity of proroguing them. That they had, by their conduct, struck at the root of the constitution; and that if the lord-lieutenant had not prorogued them, he would have been liable to an impeachment. However, this motion, like others brought in by the ministry, was over-ruled, and Ireland was left, for some time, in a state of confusion and distress.

Near the close of this session of parliament, several proposals were made in the house of lords relating to the state affairs in America; and these were chiefly supported by the duke of Richmond. These were introduced by some severe strictures on the conduct of administration. He said, that the state of America had been recommended from the throne in a speech at the opening of the session, and yet the session was near spent without any thing being done, though the business was of the utmost importance. The ministry were now sensible that they had been too rash in recommending the care of America before any settled plan had been laid down; and therefore, perplexed to the utmost, they saw no other method left, but that of adjourning the debate till a future day, well knowing that the parliament would be prorogued.

On the nineteenth of May his majesty went to the house, and, in a speech from the throne, applauded them for the zeal they had shewn in supporting the interest and honour of the nation. He assured them, that he should, on all occasions, seek the happiness of his people; and that it should be the sole object of his care, to watch over their interests. He concluded, by recommending to them the preservation of public peace, and the discountenancing of tumultuous meetings of the people, which, if encouraged, must end in general confusion.

Before we return to take notice of the state of affairs on the continent, we shall here observe, that on the twenty-seventh of July, about four o'clock in the morning, a most dreadful fire broke out, or was discovered in the great dock-yard at Portsmouth. It burnt with the most rapid fury, and communicating itself with the hemp-house, and other offices, consumed every thing before it. Whether this was an accident, or the work of some vile wretch and incendiary, has not yet been discovered, and perhaps never will. Some impostors, indeed, pretended to have been concerned in it, particularly one Dudley, who has since that time been transported for perjury; and the other, whose name was Britain, has been since executed for forgery. The most remarkable circumstance attending this fatal affair was, the fire was discovered in five different places at once, which gave strong suspicions that more than one person must have been concerned; for accidental fires generally break out in one place only. Had this accident, or whatever it was, happened during the heat of the war, it might have proved fatal to the nation in general; for the whole loss, amounting to one hundred and forty-nine thousand, eight hundred, and eighty-eight pounds, could not have been made good without great difficulty, till such time as the parliament met. But even supposing one individual could have advanced it, yet the time necessary for replacing the stores, might have given the enemy an opportunity of doing great injury to the place.

While the Russians seemed to triumph on the Danube and Neister, a large fleet of men of war was fitted out, by order of the empress, to pass the Sound, and from thence proceed up the streights to attack the Turks by sea as well as land. It will appear evident to those persons conversant with history, that extraordinary events are seldom brought about but by a concurrence of circumstances to facilitate their execution; and it may perhaps be asserted, that all the great revolutions of which we read in history, would have failed had they not been attempted at one particular period; namely, that in which they took place.

The efforts of Peter the Great to create a navy, and bring up sailors, had been looked upon as the extraordinary attempt of a great man, and it was imagined the project would die with him, but the reverse took place; for although Russia has been, almost since his death, governed by women, yet their empire has been advancing gradually to a state of perfection. Her navy is now as respectable as can be imagined; and her sailors, naturally robust and hardy, think no dangers too great.

The last vizier, who had acted in so rash and unguarded a manner, was deposed, and banished to one of the Greek islands; and that honour was conferred on Hiliel Bey, a man of great abilities and unshaken integrity. He knew that the provinces of Moldavia and Walachia were the grand objects the Russians had in view; and therefore, contrary to the custom of the Turks, he resolved to venture on a winter campaign. This was a design worthy of a great commander; for he imagined that the Russians would be too much flushed with their late successes, to think of any attack being made upon them. In that, however, the vizier was mistaken; for the Russians were too vigilant to be surprised, and both armies continued skirmishing, in small parties, during the winter and spring. In general, the Russians were successful in these engagements, so that the grand vizier's plan did not succeed in its full extent; but still, by keeping his men in continual action, they became more and more acquainted with the art of war.

In the mean time, the country where the seat of war lay presented a scene of the most dreadful desolation: almost every thing had been destroyed; and such of the miserable inhabitants as had not time to escape to the neighbouring countries, were either made slaves by the Tartars, or butchered, to satisfy the rage and fury of the Turks.

The army under the command of general Romanzow having crossed the Neister, and marched on slowly towards the Pruth, a river which rises in Poland; crosses Moldavia, and falls into the Danube. From thence he continued his march to Jassy, the capital of Moldavia, about two hundred miles east of Choczim. Great part of the country through which he passed was little better than a desert, being totally destitute of water, so that they were obliged to carry that necessary article along with them. Such impediments may easily account for the slowness of general Romanzow, who seemed to move in a similar direction with count Panin, who was at the head of an army on the banks of the Neister, his design being to lay siege to the important fortress of Bender.

Every thing seemed now to give way to the Russian power; and several detachments of the Turks having been cut off, the grand vizier resolved to venture on an engagement. About eight o'clock in the evening, both armies came in sight of each other, near the banks of the Pruth, and the Tartars were drawn up on the left of the Russians; but soon afterwards, they spread themselves out into small parties, in order to cut off a convoy of waggons, containing the provisions for the Russian army.

In some situations, and under several circumstances, boldness is prudence, and then it is that great minds are discovered, by their actions, from mere common abilities. General Romanzow was one of those great men; for had a less experienced commander been at the head of the Russian army, they might have been totally cut off. The Russians had been very much weakened by sending out detached parties, and therefore it seemed little better than madness to venture on an engagement. The general, however, confiding in the goodness of his troops, and the confidence they had in him, from a long series of successes, resolved to attack the enemy next morning. Accordingly they began to move, in order of battle, about day-break; and, as soon as it was light, the general found, that, notwithstanding the vast superiority of numbers, the Turks had thrown up strong entrenchments before their camp. This did not in the least damp the spirits of the Russian general, for he had formed a resolution, and, let the consequences be what they would, he persisted in going through with it. His situation, indeed, was truly critical; for, had he been defeated, the army under the command of general Panin would have been taken in the rear, and the heavy artillery must have fallen into the hands of the Turks.

The Turks, notwithstanding their having thrown up entrenchments, no sooner saw the Russians advancing, than they marched out to meet them; but the good order and regular discipline of the Russians bore down all opposition, and they drove the Turks back to their entrenchments. The battle now became dreadful; for the grand vizier seeing the critical situation he was in, made a sally at the head of his best troops; but the Russians, with their bayonets, forced them back, and took possession of the first entrenchment. The battle now became more bloody than ever; and, after the Turks had used every effort to retrieve the honour of the day, the Russian discipline overcame, and all the entrenchments were taken.

The route now became general; the Turks fled on every side; while the grand vizier, seeing the battle totally lost, made the best of his way for the Danube, which was distant about twenty-four miles.

This was one of the completest victories that we read of in history; for the whole camp equipage, with the tents, one hundred and forty-three pieces of cannon, and above seven thousand carriages loaded with provisions, fell into the hands of the Russians. Seven thousand Turks were left dead on the field; many were made prisoners; while the rest were pursued as far as the Danube, in which some thousands of them were drowned.

While the Russians, under general Romanzow, were gaining victories every day in Moldavia, count Panin laid siege to Bender, which the Turks had fortified in the strongest manner. The garrison made a most vigorous defence; and, in the compass of fourteen days from the opening of the trenches, they sallied out seven different times upon the Russians. The governor was so overcome with grief and despair when he heard that the grand vizier had been defeated, that he took poison, and so put an end to his own life. The garrison, determined to hold out to the last, made choice of another in his room, who behaved with great bravery; for the siege was carried on with unremitted fury, and the place as gallantly defended, till the Russians, tired out with delays, resolved to make one vigorous effort, which was done by three different columns in the night of the seventh of September.

The walls had been undermined, and a vast quantity of gunpowder put into the aperture; which being set fire to, blew up in the most dreadful manner; while the different columns having joined each other, entered the breach sword in hand, and carried destruction along with them. A most dreadful carnage ensued; for the Russians spared none who came in their way, and the greatest part of the town was reduced to ashes.

The misfortunes of the Turks were not confined to the Danube or the Neister; for the most northerly, as well as the most southerly parts of their dominions in Europe, seemed doomed to all the calamities of war. The time seemed to be arrived, when the most wretched state of their government, which, for many years, had suffered their military, as well as their naval force, to fall into decay and ruin, should be punished both by sea and land. The conduct of the Turks, in suffering themselves to sleep into a stupid security, is similar to an error which all great empires have fallen into at one time or other. For the truth of this, we have no more to do than to turn to the histories of those great empires which once made such distinguishing figures; but are now only known by name. They grew up to a state of maturity by virtue and valour; their middle ages were distinguished guished by well regulated institutions; but sloth, effeminacy, and the relaxation of every moral obligation, undermined their foundations, and brought on their ruin.

The Russian fleet, the first belonging to that empire that ever passed the Sound, failed from England, and passing the streights of Gibraltar, arrived at Port-Mahon, in the island of Minorca, in a very shattered and sickly condition. There they received all that friendly assistance for which the English are so justly celebrated; and the salutary air, with the use of fresh provisions, soon restored the men to health; so that the fleet was enabled to weigh anchor, and proceed on its voyage. In the mean time, application was made to the maritime states of Italy, to know on what terms they would act with respect to the Russians; and whether, in case of their being reduced to distress, they would allow them shelter in their harbours. Those states gave but a very reserved and equivocal answer, till at last pressed to it, they promised to allow some of them to come in, under certain restrictions.

During the latter part of the last year, some Russian officers had been employed in carrying on a negotiation with the Greeks, which was no difficult matter to bring about, seeing they were both of the same religion, and had been long oppressed by the Turks. They now hoped to shake off the yoke of slavery; and their hopes rose to a pitch of extravagance equal to that of the Jews, when they imagined the Messiah was come among them.

Count Orlow, who commanded the Russian fleet, set sail from Minorca in the beginning of February; and, after a very dangerous and tedious voyage, arrived at Cape Metapan, the ancient promontory of Tenarus. This country, the ancient and famous Peloponnesus, once the seat of philosophers and poets, being all classical ground, is too well known to require any description. Indeed, if it did, modern travellers can supply that defect, though their accounts are far inferior to those of the ancients.

The Russian admiral having landed the forces which he had on board, at Maina, the capital of the ancient Sparta, the people of the country, the descendants of the ancient Lacedemonians, who still retained some of the spirit of their ancestors, flocked in great numbers to join his standard. The other Greeks in general followed their example; for, in general, the inhabitants of the Morea only waited for an opportunity of asserting their freedom.

Arcadia, Mistra, and many other places, were soon taken; and the Greeks massacred every Turk whom they laid hold of, without regard to age or sex. From this we may infer, that although the Greeks assume to themselves the name of Christians, they are destitute of the first principles of humanity; for whatever cruelty had been inflicted on them by the Turkish government, yet that did not warrant their murdering individuals.

The Turkish governor of Messalougi finding himself unable to defend the place any longer, and expecting no mercy from the Russians, put his person under the protection of the Greek Syndic, the chief magistrate of the town; but no sooner had the villainous Syndic got him in his power, than he caused him to be put to death.

Nor was this unnatural fury confined to the continent; for revenge, novelty, and the hope of plunder, operated every where, and even extended to the islands, where the most horrid murders were committed, with circumstances of the most savage barbarity. Three Turkish ships, with some recruits on board, for the service of the army on the continent, having put into the island of Milone, one of the ancient Cyclades, the greatest part of the crew going on shore, were all barbarously murdered. At Maina, count Orlow published a manifesto in the name of the empress of Russia, wherein, among other things, it is expressly declared, that she looked upon herself as under a religious obligation to set the Greeks at liberty from the Turkish slavery, promising, at the same time, protection to all those who would join her army, and threatening military execution to such as refused; for it is remarkable in the Russians, that they seldom publish a proclamation that is not clogged with some oppressive mark or condition.

From Maina count Orlow sailed for Corom, a strong town at the extremity of the peninsula; but the fortifications of it had been long neglected, like most other towns in the Turkish empire, so that it was soon taken. The harbour was good, and capable of admitting a great number of ships; and therefore the Russian admiral ordered that it should be their place of general rendezvous.

Petras was taken in the latter end of March, it being one of the most important places in the Morea. It is celebrated in history for being the metropolitan city of Claventia, and is situated on that arm of the gulph which separates it from the ancient Livadia, about sixty miles west of Corinth, and one hundred and twenty north-west of Mistra. This great and once flourishing city was not able to make any defence; and the Greeks, who accompanied the Russian army, no sooner made a breach in the walls, than they broke in, and murdered the innocent inhabitants, without any distinction of age or sex. Such as could make their escape from the hands of the murderers, (for they merit no better name) took shelter in the castle, which the Russians and Greeks instantly besieged. The Greeks, however, were but of little service to the Russians, for they minded plunder more than military discipline.

In the mean time, a body of Albanians and Turks having passed the Isthmus, marched to its relief, and engaged the Russians in the most furious manner. At the same time, the governor made a sally, and a mine bursting, the city was set on fire, and burnt down to the ground. The Turks took a severe revenge on the Greeks for their cruelties, for they put every one to the sword, not even sparing their priests at the altar. All the foreign consuls had made their escape, except the son of the English consul, who, on this memorable occasion, acted with such spirit and humanity, as will ever do honour to his memory. This young gentleman had shut himself up in his father's house, which he looked upon as a sanctuary, consistent with the established laws of nations; and took under his protection seventy persons, some of whom were ladies of distinction. In the height of the confusion, a body of Albanians, armed with axes, came to break open the door; but he representing to them that he belonged to a nation that was in alliance with the Grand Seignior; they, in the most generous and humane manner, carried him, with all those under his protection, to the castle. There, however, their fears were redoubled, for the first scene which presented itself to their eyes, was a heap of mangled bodies, and several Turkish executioners, according to their forms, employed in cutting off the heads of all the Greek prisoners as fast as they were brought in. The English gentleman, with his companions, would have shared the same fate, had not the governor, who knew him, arrived at that instant, and taken him, with all his companions, under his protection. The same night they got on board a vessel in the harbour, which conveyed them safely to Zante, to the great joy of the English consul, who imagined that he had been killed.

From this time forward the Greeks began to suffer in their turn, for those cruelties which, in their rage, they had inflicted on the Turks. A large body of them having advanced to the isthmus of Corinth, in order to cross over into Achaia, the Turks came up with them, killed above two thousand, and took a great number of them prisoners, whose heads were instantly cut off. All Greece, now called the Morea, exhibited murder, famine, and putrid bodies in every place. The Greeks and Turks were equally cruel to each other, nor could two meet together without one being killed.

Indeed,

Indeed, it is, in many striking instances, painful to treat of these cruelties, or even of this war in general, which has, through all its different parts, been sullied and disgraced by acts of ferocity, oppression, and cruelty, which are happily but little known in the middle or western parts of Europe. The enmities of these polished nations are tempered with a generosity and humanity which alleviate, and, in a great measure, conceal the deformity and horrors of war; and a list of the killed and wounded after an engagement, causes little more emotion than the sight of an adjutant's roll would before it.

Soon after the Greeks had been defeated in the isthmus of Corinth, the bassaw of Bosnia arrived in the Morea, at the head of thirty thousand men, mostly Albanians; and he ordered all the Greeks who were found in arms, or any way distant from their villages, to be instantly put to death. The Greek archbishop of Trippolizza, with many other persons of great distinction, shared the same fate, under pretence that they had stirred up the people to revolt.

The chief force of the Russians was now, in concert with some Greeks, engaged in the siege of Modon, about one hundred miles west of Corinth. It is a place of great strength, with a castle, and an exceeding good harbour; so that, while the Russian army attacked it by land, the fleet seconded their operations by sea. Had they taken this important place, they would have been able to maintain a footing in the peninsula, at least till some reinforcements came to their assistance. But a body of Turks and Albanians having crossed the peninsula, attacked the besiegers with great fury, and were seconded by a vigorous sally made by the governor. It now appeared evident that the spirit of the ancient Spartans had forsaken these their degenerate descendants; for the Greeks, dispirited by their late overthrow, which taught them the difference between massacring an innocent multitude of people, and engaging in battle with an enemy, abandoned their posts as soon as they were attacked, and were cut in pieces without resistance. The Russians, however, made a noble stand, and fought in the most courageous manner, to protect the cowardly Greeks, who, if they had acted with only a common degree of resolution, a complete victory might have been obtained. But at last the Russians were overpowered by numbers, and obliged to retreat to the shore, under the protection of their ships.

The Albanians and Turks, now flushed with the thoughts of success, gave themselves up to plundering the camp; which the Russians observing, turned upon them, and routed them with great slaughter; so that they once more got possession of their camp and battery. This success brought some more of the Greeks to their assistance, and now the siege was renewed with redoubled vigour. The Russians were now convinced that no time was to be lost, and that they must endeavour to take it before any fresh forces could come up. Accordingly, an attack was made; but the Greeks, who were quite dispirited, separated themselves from the Russians, who were again obliged to abandon the place.

During these transactions in the Morea, the Russian fleet was reinforced by more ships, which had sailed from England in the beginning of the year; and both being joined, they came up with the Turkish fleet in the channel of Scio, which divides Natolia, in the Lesser Asia, from Europe. The Turkish fleet was considerably superior to that of the Russians, and the engagement began with great fury. A Turkish and a Russian ship got fastened together, and both blew up with a dreadful explosion, so that only a few of the hands on board were saved. The dreadful fate of these ships occasioned a panic on both sides for some time; but the engagement being again renewed, it continued till night separated them, without any material advantage on either side.

As soon as it was dark, the Turkish admiral, contrary to the advice of his bravest officers, ordered the cables to be cut, and then sailed into a small bay on the coast of Natolia. This was a most imprudent step, for the Russian fleet surrounded them in the morning, and came to an anchor beside them. Admiral Elphinston then began to make preparations to send in four fire-ships among them; but this being a piece of service with which the Russians were but little acquainted, they seemed very unwilling to engage in it. An English lieutenant then undertook the dangerous expedient, and commodore Greig, another officer of the same nation, undertook to conduct the ships that were to cover them. At twelve at night commodore Greig, with four ships of the line and two frigates, approached the mouth of the harbour, and engaged the enemy within four hundred yards. A most dreadful cannonade begun and lasted an hour, when, about one o'clock, a signal was given for Mr. Dugdale, the English lieutenant, to run in with the fire-ships, which he instantly performed, and bore down upon the Turkish fleet. At the same time a shot having set the rigging of one of the Turkish ships on fire, it added greatly to the confusion, in a place where they had scarce room to act. It was impossible for the brave lieutenant to keep the Russians in order, and at last they flung themselves into the boat, and left him on board alone. Presence of mind, and that courage by which the British seamen have been so long distinguished, enabled him to surmount difficulty; for having lashed the helm, he set fire to the ship, and then threw himself into the sea, and swam to one of the Russian ships.

The three other ships took fire at the same time, and rushing into the center of the Turkish fleet, the whole was consumed, except one ship the Russians towed off. They then bombarded the town, in which was a strong castle; but a shot from one of the Russian ships having set fire to the powder magazine, the whole blew up, and the place was reduced to a heap of rubbish. Thus through the obstinacy of the Turkish admiral of a fleet, a castle and a town that existed at one o'clock in the morning, was, in eight hours after, reduced to a heap of rubbish. It is said, that the Turks lost six thousand men on this memorable occasion, and such of the sailors as had the good fortune to make their escape, murdered all the Greeks that came in their way, and even attempted to set fire to their cities.

These Russians, to whose rage nothing could set bounds, marched as far as Smyrna, where they murdered three hundred Greeks; and had it not been for the interposition of the Janizaries, they would have served all the European merchants in the same barbarous manner, and even set fire to the city. In the mean time, the Turkish admiral was beheaded, by order of the grand-seignior, for having run his ships into a place where they became an easy prey to the Russians. Indeed it would seem, that he had been no way acquainted with naval affairs, for no admiral ought ever to come near land till he is in a manner sure of victory.

The Russians, who were now triumphant at sea, blocked up the passage to the Dardanelles, and interrupted every ship that attempted to pass them, without any regard to the nations to which they belonged; but when they found that they had no intention of assisting the Turks, they suffered them to proceed to some other port. Count Orlov, the Russian admiral, preferred the brave lieutenant Dugdale to the command of the Turkish ship that had been saved, and which carried sixty-two brass guns; and commodore Greig was made an admiral. The Greeks, filled with revenge against their cruel masters the Turks, murdered the people in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles; so that the whole Archipelago was filled with their barbarities.

The ancient and once famous city of Smyrna, where many great men have been born, and which, for two centuries, has been a place of great trade, was now in a very critical situation. The inhabitants expected to be attacked by the Russians every day, and the foreign European merchants; who had factories there, gave up all for lost. It was a most dangerous expedient for them to apply to the Russian admiral, lest the Turks should have been jealous of them; but at last the common danger cemented them together for their mutual safety, and the Turks joined with them in the application. Accordingly, an English merchant was sent to count Orlov, whom he found engaged in the siege of Lemnos, and by whom he was told, that he had strict orders to protect the Christians of all nations, but more particularly the English; because there was a treaty of peace and commerce at that time subsisting between them and the English. He dismissed him with marks of the greatest politeness, and told him, that he and the other gentlemen in the factories might make themselves quite easy, as no harm would happen to them.

During the whole of this year, France was torn with intestine divisions. The arbitrary proceedings at court were such, that the parliaments in the provinces refused to register the edicts. The king wanted money to support his extravagance, and the most illegal taxes were imposed on the people, at a time when the necessities of life were so scarce that the people were, in a manner, starving. The parliaments, on this occasion, acted with integrity and firmness, and nothing could force them to give a sanction to what was both unjust and oppressive. Dragoons, however, extorted that which faithful magistrates refused to grant; the taxes were raised by force, and the members of the different parliaments were sent to different prisons, where they were not suffered to converse with their friends or relations. In a word, the state of France, during this year, was the most miserable that could have been imagined. Justice was obstructed, the decrees of the courts, that seemed to affect the payment of the oppressive taxes, were all ordered to be erased, soldiers were quartered on such of the counsellors as had spoken boldly in defence of the people; and it may justly be said, that all France was groaning under military power.

Italy, which has often been the theatre of war, now enjoyed perfect tranquillity; and the different states seemed to vie with each other in promoting commerce and agriculture. Several regulations were made with respect to the clergy, for the Italians are far from being such bigots as they were formerly. Indeed, they have in that instance acted with moderation and prudence, so as not to do any thing violently; and there is no doubt but that will in the end bring about a general reformation.

The pope, by his good sense and the peculiar happiness of his temper, acted with such moderation that these states, who were on bad terms with his predecessor, freely acknowledged his power in all things of a spiritual nature. By these means enmity died away, and the blessings of peace were diffused from Sicily to the Alps.

Portugal, that had long been at enmity with the see of Rome, now admitted a nuncio from the pope; so that by prudence and moderation this great ecclesiastic was doing more than ever could have taken place by the thunders of the vatican. He abolished many ridiculous customs, and on the whole seemed to have nothing so much in view as the reducing the Roman catholic religion to a rational system.

In Corsica, during this year, the wretched inhabitants felt all the severity of a French despotic government. Many of them still refused to submit, and such of these unhappy people as were taken, were instantly put to death. Some of them were transported to France; but this was little more than shifting the scene: for as in Corsica they beheld the ruin of their country, so in France they saw a whole nation of people ruined. But here their suffering did not end; for such as were brought to France, after a journey of six hundred miles on foot from Marseilles to Brest, were put on board several vessels and sent as slaves to the West-Indies. What havoc has the ambition of tyrants made among the children of men!

This year a war was likely to have broke out between Great-Britain and Spain; on account of the following affair:

In the year 1592 captain Davies, who commanded an English man of war, sailed to the South Seas, where he discovered some islands, since called Falklands; but little notice was taken of them for more than a century, till commodore Anson, in his voyage round the world, discovered the importance they would be of to us, if properly cultivated. Accordingly, soon after the late peace, when lord Anson was at the head of the admiralty, he mentioned the affair in council; and it was proposed to send out some frigates to visit them. This scheme, however, was not so well conducted, but the Spaniards got notice of it before it could be carried into execution; and such remonstrances were made by their ambassador at our court, that it was again laid aside.

It was again revived; and in 1764 commodore Byron was sent out with a small squadron to make discoveries, and, if possible, establish a settlement on the coast of Patagonia. During that voyage, he took possession of Falklands islands in the name of his Britannic majesty, with all the forms used on such occasions.

Much about this time the French, stimulated by their losses during the war, undertook an expedition of a similar nature, namely, to make discoveries in the South Seas; and the care of it was committed to one M. de Bougainville, colonel of a regiment of foot. This gentleman entered into this adventure with all that life and spirit so peculiar to his countrymen. Having fitted out a frigate of twenty guns, with a sloop to carry provisions, he took on board one hundred seamen, and about one hundred and fifty people, who chose to try their fortune in that part of the world. The French ships set sail from St. Malo, and arrived at the Canaries, where they were kindly received by the Spaniards, who gave them every sort of assistance. From thence they proceeded to the river Plata, and took in fresh provisions, the Spaniards still continuing to treat them with every mark of respect. At length, they came to Falklands Islands, where they formed an establishment, and built a small fort.

These French adventurers had formed the most sanguine hopes from the discovery of these islands, but they did not answer their expectations; for it cost them more money to support their settlement than the profits arising from it could afford; so that they gave it up to the Spaniards in the most formal manner.

These islands are situated in latitude 51 south, and about one hundred leagues on this side the streights of Magellan. The settlement, which had been given up by the French to the Spaniards, was on one of the islands that lay to the west, and was called Port Solidad; and Port Egmont, belonging to the English, was one of the islands to the eastward. It is not certainly known, that these settlers knew of each other for some time, and certain it is, that in commodore's Byron's account of them, he mentions nothing of any settlement but the English one at Port Egmont. However, in the year 1769, we had a frigate and a sloop upon that station, and captain Hunt, in the Tamar frigate, being on a cruise, fell in with a Spanish schooner belonging to Port Solidad, and according to his orders, commanded the Spanish captain to depart, because these islands were the property of Great-Britain. In two days afterwards, the captain came on board the Tamar frigate with a letter to captain Hunt, written by the governor of Port Solidad, telling him, that if he had been driven in there by stress of weather; he was ready to give him every assistance; but if he came there in violation of the faith of the most solemn treaties, he had far better depart immediately. Captain Hunt, not in the least intimidated with these threatenings, asserted the right his Britannic majesty had to these islands, and warned him to depart from them, giving him six months for that purpose. The Spanish officer entered a formal protest against captain Hunt, and declared, that if he offered any insult to the settlement at Port Solidad, or removed from these islands, he should consider it as a breach of the peace, and transmit an account thereof to Spain. Soon after this affair, two Spanish frigates of considerable force arrived at Port Egmont, under pretence that they wanted fresh water; and the commander in chief sent notice to captain Hunt, that he was astonished to see the English flag hoisted in an island that belonged to his master the king of Spain. He charged captain Hunt with violating the peace; declaring, at the same time, that he would send an account thereof to Spain, that his master might assert his right to those islands which had been made over to him by treaty.

Captain Hunt still continued to found his possession on the claim of right, justified his conduct by the orders of his sovereign, and again warned the Spaniards to depart from these islands. The frigates continued eight days at Port Egmont, and were supplied by our people with water: the captain and officers behaved with civility, but they declined going on shore though they were several times invited. As these transactions seemed to indicate an approaching rupture, captain Hunt set sail for England, and arriving at Plymouth on the third of June, sent an express to the lords of the admiralty. The Swift and Favourite sloops of war, each bearing sixteen guns, were left to take care of the settlement; but the Swift having sailed as far as the straits of Magellan, was overset, and such of the crew as could get into the boat, undertook a voyage of three weeks, which brought them to Port Egmont, after experiencing an innumerable variety of hardships. Five Spanish frigates arrived at Port Egmont, and captain Farmer, not doubting but they came with hostile intentions, resolved to be upon his guard. He accordingly hoisted his flag, which the Spanish commodore seeing, fired two shots, and being asked what were his reasons for so doing, he said they were only by way of signals.

In the mean time captain Farmer wrote to the Spanish commodore, that as he had received the refreshments he wanted, he was obliged in the name, and by the authority of his master, to command him to depart, and totally evacuate all those islands known by the name of Falklands. In answer to this letter, the commodore put captain Farmer in mind of his great power, and how easy it was for him to destroy their defenceless settlement. He begged that he and the other English officers would not force him to any extremities, but depart quietly from the place, as the islands belonged to his master the king of Spain. Next day he wrote again, both to captain Farmer and captain Maltby, telling them, that if they would depart peaceably they should have leave to take all they had along with them from the settlement, and what they could not take, he should give them a receipt for, that the whole affair might be settled by their respective courts. But on the other hand, if they refused to comply, he would, contrary to his inclinations, be obliged to obey his orders, by attacking their settlement both by sea and land, and that he would spread desolation every where before him; for he had, under his command, a large body of marines, besides a train of heavy artillery.

He concluded by assuring them, that if they did not, in fifteen minutes after the receipt of his letter, give him a plain and favourable answer, he would immediately commence hostilities; and, at the same time, desired them to think of the dreadful consequences which their obstinacy would be productive of to the subjects of his Britannic majesty.

To these, and all his other menaces, the English captains returned for answer, that words are not always considered as acts of hostilities; and that they could not believe that he would, in a time of profound peace, when the greatest harmony subsisted between the two nations, put his threats in execution: that he did not doubt but he was thoroughly convinced; that the king of Great-Britain, their master, was capable of demanding satisfaction throughout every part of the globe where any insult was offered to his flag; and therefore they were, in consequence of their orders, obliged to defend the place to the last extremity. Accordingly the Spanish commodore ordered the frigates to row close to the shore; directly opposite the Block-house, where there was only a small battery; and at night captain Maltby brought fifty seamen, belonging to the Favourite, on shore, with two six pounders, ten swivels, and a quantity of small-arms and ammunition. Next morning, part of the Spanish troops and artillery landed about a mile to the northward of the Block-house; and when they had advanced about half a mile, the rest of the boats, with the troops and artillery, put off from one of the Spanish frigates, and rowed right in for the cove, being covered by the fire from the frigates, whose shot went over the Block-house. The English seamen, who were then on shore, fired some small shot; but seeing the utter impossibility of defending the settlement, and the Spaniards having broke through all the limits of peace, even to the actual commencement of hostilities, so that their conduct could neither be denied nor explained away, our officers, as they had judiciously led them to this open avowal of their conduct, and had, at the same time, supported the honour of their own country, as far as the means in their power would admit of, with the same propriety preferred saving the valuable lives of their people; and leaving the injury to be redressed by those in power; they thought it most prudent to hang out a flag of truce, in order to know what terms of capitulation the Spanish commodore would grant.

All the conditions which he would grant were; that the English should immediately, or as soon as possible, so as it did not exceed forty days, remove from the settlement, and what stores they left behind them should be produced as soon as orders for that purpose arrived from Spain. This was one of the greatest insults, perhaps, that had ever been offered to the British flag; but the English, who had not strength sufficient to defend themselves, were obliged to comply, and in September arrived at Portsmouth.

The navy of Great-Britain was then in a very indifferent condition; and political debates ran so high, that people in general were dissatisfied with the conduct of the ministry. Press warrants had been issued for raising seamen, but the legality of them was, in several places, called in question. In the city of London, Mr. Crosby, the lord-mayor, refused to back the press warrants; Mr. alderman Wilkes discharged a man who had been impressed; and although the opinion of council was taken on this important subject, yet, among the more sensible and judicious, the practice itself was looked upon as inconsistent with the nature of the British constitution.

In the mean time, such as were averse to a war, or dreaded the consequences of it, looked back with resentment to the last peace, and to those who had advised the making of it. All the arguments made use of in defence of it were treated with the utmost contempt, and the whole was considered as a measure which, in its consequences, must for ever dishonour the British nation. Indeed, many sober persons, whose minds were free from passion or prejudice, and who, judging of the disputes between the rival nations only by the same equitable and disinterested principles which should at all times take place between private persons, had not, at that time, in general, disapproved of the conditions of peace, could not now refrain from the utmost indignation, at beholding the flagrant insult we had received from an enemy we had so lately in our power to chastise, and from thinking that those who said, that the fruits of one of the most glorious and successful wars mentioned in history, had been bartered away for an inglorious and insecure peace, had but too much reason on their side; and therefore there there was no wonder that the people should find fault with the measures of administration.

In this state of anxiety, doubt, and expectation, all people longed, in the most eager manner, for the meeting of parliament. No change had taken place in administration during the recess; and as lord North had successfully weathered all the storms of the winter, supported by a prodigious majority in both houses, he seemed now to be as securely fixed in his seat at the head of the treasury, as the precarious circumstances of the times would admit of. The state of the different parties in opposition had not hitherto suffered any material change. The death of Mr. Grenville, which happened in the beginning of November, having left that party to which he belonged without a leader, some of the most distinguished of them, and who appeared the most sanguine in opposition, went over to the court. The party that adhered to the marquis of Rockingham, and who were called the Whig party, still adhered to their former principles; and such as were attached to the earl of Chatham, earl Temple, and the earl of Shelburne, consisting of a mixture of whigs and Tories, generally coincided with the Rockingham party.

On the thirteenth of November, both houses of parliament met at Westminster, and was opened by his majesty with a speech from the throne. He told them, that the Spanish governor of Buenos Ayres had acted in such a manner as was inconsistent with the honour of Great-Britain; and demanded the utmost satisfaction: that, under these circumstances, an immediate demand had been made for proper satisfaction, in consequence of the injury received; that the necessary preparations had been made, without loss of time, in order to be enabled to obtain justice, in case the requisition to the court of Spain should fail in procuring it. An assurance was given that these preparations should not be discontinued, until proper reparation had been made; and that sufficient proofs should be given, that all other powers on the continent disapproved of such proceedings. He said he had called them together so early, that they might be ready to assist him with the best of their advice, and provide for the honour and security of the nation. With respect to the colonies in America, it was observed, that many of the factious people had desisted from those combinations into which they had inadvertently entered; and which had been attended with many fatal consequences to their peaceable fellow subjects: that the people of Boston, and, in general, the inhabitants of the province of Massachusetts Bay, could not yet be brought into a proper state of obedience; but continued in carrying on the same violent and unwarrantable practices as before. He added; that the estimates for the present year would naturally exceed the former; and that it would be neither consulting the inclinations nor the interests of his people, if they should decline any expence that should seem necessary towards promoting the national honour; that as to foreign measures, no doubt was held, that there could be any other contest, than who should appear most forward in support of the common cause, in upholding the reputation, and promoting the prosperity of the kingdom. He concluded by telling them, that the crown had no interest separate from that of the people; that they were all members of the same body; and, consistent with the order of nature and the laws of society, they must stand or fall together.

The addresses were the most spirited that had been presented for some years; and the most unreserved assurances were given, that every degree of requisite support should be cheerfully granted. The most unreserved confidence was placed in his majesty; that he would never be induced, by a mistaken tenderness for the present ease of the people, to sacrifice their more essential and lasting interests. The commons concluded by a declaration, that if any hopes had been conceived, or it should have been any where surmised, that there were any such differences subsisting among the people, as could, in the least degree, abate the ardour of their affectionate attachment to his majesty, or prevent their joining, as one man, in maintaining unfulfilled the lustre of the crown, and preserving undiminished the rights of the people, they would, by their proceedings, convince the world how false and scandalous all such surmises were; and make it manifest, that, whenever they were called upon in the cause of their king and country, there would be but one heart and one voice among them.

Although these addresses were carried by a vast majority, there arose considerable debates upon them. It was said by those in opposition, that as one insult is always the forerunner of others; so the present outrage offered by Spain was a natural consequence of our passive and shameful conduct with regard to Corsica: that the speech was an ostentatious display of ministerial conduct, and the address an approbation of it: that before such a public approbation was given, it was necessary to know what that conduct had been, which merited such applauses: that it was necessary to know what the Spaniards had done, and what previous information our ministry had received of their designs: that by our conduct for twelve months past, it seemed as if we had not an enemy in the world; and yet, by the speech, it was evident that a war was apprehended: the bad state of our navy, and the defenceless manner in which the valuable island of Jamaica was left, were much insisted on, and with great force of argument; that, independent of any private intelligence, the accounts publicly avowed to have been received on the third of June, that the Spaniards had warned our people to depart from their settlement on Falklands Islands, was, in itself, a sufficient indication of their ill designs, and of what was naturally to follow; but between that and the twenty-second of September, when our people brought the account of the insult on our flag; what had been done to put us in a state of security at home, or enable us to protect our dominions abroad? Were the regiments completed, or was the navy manned and put in a proper condition? None of all these things were done, and yet we are to return thanks to the ministry, not for any thing; but only because they have not done something worse than we are yet acquainted with.

It was farther insisted, that while the rights of the people were violated at home, it was absurd to expect such unanimity among them as was necessary to support the honour of the nation against any foreign power. That part of the speech which mentions the governor of Buenos Ayres, was most severely censured; and even ridiculed, both without and within doors. It was said; Why should an officer, who acted only under command; be considered, instead of the king his master, as the principal in an injury offered to this great nation? The answer is evident; the same temporizing, mean and cowardly policy, prevails, which beheld the seizure of Corsica, in defiance of faith and of treaties; and now hopes, under this subterfuge, to find some means of prolonging its existence, though at the price of the national honour and dignity.

Upon the whole, it was asserted, in positive terms, that the conduct of our ministry had neither been honest in the design, nor able in the execution; they had lost the confidence of the people; and yet imagined they would support them: that they had threatened the colonies with unrelenting severity, in pursuit of an unconstitutional measure; and yet suppose that we shall suffer nothing from an alienation of their affection: that Ireland was ruled with a rod of iron, and yet they constantly declared that they were not making strides towards arbitrary power. Lastly, that, with respect to the designs of our enemies, they had been totally blind and improvident, and yet we were in danger.

In answer to this, it was said by those who stood up in defence of the ministry, that all Europe, friends as well as enemies, were attentive to, and would found found much of their opinion upon the issue of the present day: that the sentiments contained in the address would serve nearly as much as our military preparations, to intimidate Spain, by convincing them, that whatever differences in opinion; or even transient animosities, might occasionally subsist among us, yet we have but one heart and one hand against the common enemy: that an address was a compliment to the throne, and not the approbation of a minister; and that if a minister had acted amiss, there were other methods of enquiry and censure well known, and which would involve no other character; but that the present objections were meant as an invidious attack on the crown: that nothing could be more absurd than the idea, that any private differences, discontents, or political squabbles among ourselves, could operate in such a manner upon the minds of the people, as to prevent their defending their own rights and interests, as well as the dignity of the crown, against any confederacy of our enemies: that no man would sit still, while his estate was ravaged, or his house burned, through his dislike in the manner in which public affairs were conducted: that therefore, if any domestic quarrels still existed, it would be time enough to adjust them when the common danger was removed: that the charge of alienating the colonies is so far from being well founded, that the reverse is the fact; and, except a part of one inconsiderable province, they have been brought back to a sense of their duty, by a spirit and prudence which do equal honour to administration. The charge of not arming sooner, and of making it a crime that some of our West-India islands were liable to danger, would, upon examination, it was said, appear equally groundless: that the truth was, the nation could not have been armed sooner; our fleets cannot be fitted out, except when our trade is at home, or just coming home, as sailors are not to be had at any other time; and that it is well known, that the trade was not at home, nor near coming home, in the present instance. As the ministry, therefore, could not arm effectually, it was an act of the greatest prudence not to excite a general alarm by attempting it; which would have been a signal to our enemies to have done the same, as they are not under the same disadvantages, to have effected that, which we could only have attempted; whereas now we are upon an equal footing, if not before them.

As to the other charge, it is only to ask, Whether there can be a possibility of undertaking to secure every part of the British dominions, in their whole extent, from every sudden blow that might be given in case of a war; and if there is, what given number of troops would be required to answer such an undertaking? It was said, that our character for courage was too well, and too generally established, to leave any room for our being concerned about it; and as war was never desirable while peace could be preserved with security and honour, therefore it was right to leave an opening, whereby the king of Spain might, if he chose it, withdraw himself with honour, and, by disavowing the act of his servant, avoid the alternative of a war, or of making disagreeable concessions, and of acknowledging himself the author of a rash and hasty measure.

The address being carried and presented, the duke of Richmond in the house of lords, and Mr. Dowdeswell in that of the commons, both made motions, that all the papers which had been sent to the ministry should be produced, but this the ministry would by no means comply with. In defence of their conduct, they said, that we were now engaged in a negotiation of the utmost importance with the kingdom of Spain, by which it was expected that matters would be brought to an accommodation; that the honour and happiness of two great nations were now at stake, and that if the papers were produced, it would, in a great measure, contribute towards making all Europe acquainted with secrets which ought to be concealed till the event they related to had taken place.

That if it had been prudent on our own account to unlock the English cabinet to all Europe, yet it would have been very wrong to betray the secrets of the king of Spain; that they were now treating with us, and a rude publication of what was delivered in secrecy, must at once put and end to all amicable intercourse; that the king of Spain had openly disavowed the conduct of his servant, and promised the most equitable satisfaction; that by acting with temper and prudence we might avoid the horrors of a long, bloody and expensive war; that administration had not been negligent on this occasion, for the same day the intelligence arrived, a messenger was dispatched to our ambassador at Madrid to demand satisfaction; that disputes had now arisen between the two kingdoms, on account of the ignorance or insolence of officers, while there was no intention of a quarrel between their respective governments; for in some instances our officers had not been always guarded in their conduct.

That therefore in the present instance, as well with regard to the honour as the interest of the nation, it was necessary to demand satisfaction; first, in a peaceable manner, for nothing was more reasonable than to enquire whether we had a warrantable right to resent before we commenced hostilities; otherwise it would be said that we courted war. Secondly, if the Spaniards were not to be urged into justice by reason, then they must be compelled; and administration, though willing, if possible, to avoid the calamities of war, had prepared, at all events, for the worst; so that the preparations for the war went hand in hand with the negotiation for peace. In behalf of the motion it was urged, that parliament can never have too ample a field for information; that the members are all counsellors of the crown; and to enable them to give proper council, it was necessary that every intelligence, with respect to what they were to give their advice upon, should be laid before them; that they were now met to consider the business of the kingdom, in a time of public danger; and that they had been told from the throne, that they would be applied for to advice, and although they were not, yet it was their duty to give it; that their advice and interference was now particularly necessary, when by an unparalleled succession of weak and shameful measures, the nation was disgraced, insulted, and dishonoured abroad and at home, weak, divided, and exposed to every danger; that the pretence to negotiation was an indignity to the crown, and a dishonour to the nation; that we had been forcibly robbed by a foreign power, and till what had been in this manner unjustly taken was returned, it was inconsistent with our honour to negotiate; that in fact, there is no ground or matter to negotiate upon; the Spaniards have driven our people from one of our settlements, and taken possession of it, although they had no right to do so, and yet our ministers enter into a treaty with them; that the very terms of the motions obviate all the objections that have been made to it, and which are only founded on the pretended ill consequences that would attend the exposing the papers, while this negotiation is going on.

Such were the principal points upon which this debate was carried on; but the question being put, the motion was rejected by a great majority. Many people blamed the ministry for their conduct in this affair; for they thought, that as parliament alone could grant the necessary supplies, so they ought to have had the perusal of all the papers relating to the controversy; and it is an established principle, that the man who acts from motives of integrity, need never be either afraid or ashamed to have his conduct enquired into.

The next motion, which was looked upon consistent with the fundamental principles of our constitution, was made in the house of lords, to enquire into the legality of the Middlesex election; and the debates on that important subject were carried on in the most learned and eloquent manner. In particular lord Camden spoke in the most forcible manner, in defence of the rights of the people; but the motion was rejected. As some prosecutions had been carried on by the attorney-general against several booksellers and printers, a motion was made to enquire into the legal power of that law officer, and a long debate ensued. The principal question to be discussed was, whether juries are judges of the law as well as the fact, or whether they are judges of the fact only. That juries are judges of the law as well as the fact; the following case was put by those who supported the motion. A son kills his father, and the matter of fact, which is of the blackest colour, is proved. The jury, however, examine into the circumstances, and find that it was an accidental misfortune, in which the intention had no share, and judging from thence, acquit the criminal, even from the imputation of a crime. If then they have this right, to examine into and separate the guilt and the intention, and to judge of both, upon what principle of law can they be deprived of it, in other criminal cases of less nature, such as libels, scandals, or any such thing.

That with respect to the power of juries we have, in all our general histories, a most remarkable precedent, namely, the case of the seven bishops. There the jury could have acquitted them upon another principle than that of their right to judge of the intention. An order had been sent to the bishops to cause the king's (James II.) declaration for liberty of conscience, to be read in all their churches, and these seven not only refused to do it, as contrary to law, but at the same time presented a petition against it, which being deemed a libel, they were all committed to the Tower. Having moved the court of King's-bench for a writ of Habeas Corpus to be discharged, the attorney-general filed an information, and their trial came on in Westminster-hall. The information was for writing a libel, which they denied, though at the same time they acknowledged writing the paper in question. The judges said all they could to influence the minds of the jurors; but they, like honest men, judging from the intention, found that the paper was no libel, and therefore acquitted the bishops, to the general satisfaction of all ranks of men in the nation. Some severe strictures were thrown against a great judge, who had asserted from the bench, that juries were judges of the facts only; and that upon a trial for murder, the jury had been sent back after they had brought in their verdict guilty, and were peremptorily ordered to find it only manslaughter. It was further urged, that such proceedings had excited an universal contempt among all ranks of people of our courts of law; for if juries were to be threatened and intimidated in this manner, our most valuable privileges would become an empty name, and we should have no more than the shadow, when the substance was gone. That in such cases, juries would become standing councils to an arbitrary administration, and, under pretence of being the guardians of our liberties, would give a sanction to the will of every judge who acted under the influence of the ministry; and who, on every occasion, took his instructions from them.

In answer to this it was said, that nothing in human life should be considered in a more sacred light, than the character of a judge. That in the present instance, a dishonour would be brought upon the nation; because, by implication, it would suppose that those persons who are the sacred keepers of our laws, had all been corrupted. That no specific charge had been made, for the motion was so vague and uncertain, and might have been extended to any man or body of men whatever in the kingdom. It is true, the condemnation of one or two persons was chiefly aimed at; but by an easy implication, all those in office might be included, and the guilt transferred from one to the other. But the principal part of the reply, consisted in admitting and defending the accusation. They said, they would first admit the charge to be true, that one of the judges had declared from the bench, that the jurors were judges of facts only, and not of law, nor ought they to judge thereof.

They said, that admitting all this, there was nothing at all new in the case; for it was what had ever been maintained by the judges in all ages. They did not desire to go back to the decisions of Scroggs, Jefferies, Pemberton, or Wright, because they lived in violent times; but produced the authority of one of the greatest lawyers that ever England produced, namely, the late lord Raymond. The case of Frankland for publishing the Craftsman was read by one of the members, from the ninth volume of the state-trials; and it was the same with that complained of. Frankland had published the Craftsman, in which were many severe strictures against those in power, and this was considered as a libel. The publisher was apprehended, and being held to bail, the trial came on before lord Raymond, then chief-justice of the King's bench. His lordship told the jury, that the question before them was, whether Frankland published the Craftsman, that they were judges of facts only, and not of law, unless they would take upon them to declare what law was, and abide by their own explanation. This was the very thing complained of, and it had at all times been an established maxim in the law of England. Since Magna Charta, no author had ever asserted, no judge had ever declared, nor had it been so much as ever imagined by any persons that juries could judge of the law. In proof of the above many cases were quoted, all tending to prove, that the fact and nothing more comes under the cognizance of the jury. But the principal stress of the argument was rested on the want of specification in the motion, with which the charges made in the debate had no relation. The general implication of guilt that would attend such an enquiry, when there was no reason to believe that the smallest censure had been incurred; and the injustice as well as the imprudence of raising general clamour against all the judges, when it appeared from the motion, that even the malevolent breath of suspicion falls only on two.

In reply to these arguments, it was maintained that the gentleman who made the motion, as well as those who supported it, acted upon more liberal and enlarged principles than to turn informers, so that there was no reason to brand them with a mean personality. They went on a larger field; for the causes of complaint were too numerous, and the enormities too great to be reached or implied by a specific charge; that no injury would be done, no character destroyed, no particular person ruined, unless it appeared by the result, that his conduct had merited punishment. That the causes which had already been shewn within doors, were sufficient motives for the enquiry, and that the general discontents without, and the public censure of the court, which, both in words and in writing had spread throughout the nation, made it absolutely necessary; that if any thing further need be urged in favour of it, the characters and weight of those respectable names which now required it, whether considered as members of that house, or of the community in general, should, in itself, be a cause every way sufficient to justify the motion.

That though the enquiry had been proposed upon that liberal and enlarged plan, several specific charges had been made; for the characters of the judges, and the great reverence due to our courts of justice, demanded it; that if the censure and obloquy thrown upon them should appear to be ill founded, nothing could so effectually put a stop to it, or redound so much to their honour: that all those who were real friends to the judges, and who believed them innocent, should promote the enquiry; if they were guilty, who would avow a wish to screen them from punishment?

That, in the former case, no mischief or danger can be apprehended to them; if their doctrines are constitutional, every imputation will fly off, and they will meet with the greatest applause; if they are legal, though not constitutional, it will procure neither censure nor condemnation to them, and a remedy can be sought for the disease, by making the laws and the constitution agree.

It was further insisted, that they had heard, from the mouth of one of their own members, that attempts had been made to corrupt the venerable sages of the law; and that a late judge, (Sir Joseph Yates) equally celebrated for his knowledge and integrity, had been tampered with by administration, and solicited to favour the crown in certain trials which were then depending between it and the subject: that though this, as a death-bed declaration, could not be established in such a manner as to amount to a legal proof, yet the surmise of the possibility of such an attempt was a matter of a most alarming nature, which called upon all their care and attention, and demanded the most strict inquiry into the conduct of the courts.

It was further urged, that the state trials was not one of our law-books, and therefore no precedent quoted from it could be of any authority in the present case: but supposing it to be admitted only for one moment, what consequence is to follow, or what inference to be drawn? It is the opinion of a single judge, and here it is drawn into a precedent: the history of our law is full of the different opinions of different great lawyers; and, unfortunately, few cases could be put, which may not be supported by the sanction of some time serving precedent. The only just inference is, that our laws, particularly those which were the subject of the present debate, stand as much in need of revision as our courts of justice; and it is, in the highest degree, necessary to both: that this revision is the more urgent, as, from the doctrines laid down of late, the office of a juryman appears to be so involved in intricacies, so immersed and enveloped in law, that no two of the greatest sages, who have made the laws the study of their lives, can agree in their definition of it. Let this rubbish, then, be removed, and the line drawn with such precision, that this controverted doctrine may be established on clear, determined principles, so that any sensible juryman, without being a lawyer, may know his own rights and privileges; and a judge, without daring to encroach on those privileges, may rest satisfied with his own legal authority.

Such were some of the principal arguments made use of by both parties; and the candid, unprejudiced reader will see, that passion, prejudice, and truth, were all jumbled together, without that coolness of temper which, on many occasions, has established a bad cause.

The house divided upon this important question; but when the votes came to be taken, it was rejected by a very great majority. But although the motion was rejected, a noble lord, whose conduct had been severely censured, could not rest easy under the aspersions which had been thrown out against him by the most respectable members of so awful an assembly, especially as some of them were lawyers who had made the most distinguishing figure at the bar. This nobleman had lately delivered a charge to a jury, which the popular party complained much of, because it contained sentiments coinciding with the charges already mentioned. His lordship, therefore, left a paper with the clerk, containing his opinion; and desired that it might be read in the hearing of all the peers then present, they having been summoned for that purpose. Each of the members were permitted to take a copy of this paper; and then a question was proposed, whether it was meant that the paper should be entered on the journals? which was answered in the negative. A violent debate then arose concerning the subject matter of the paper, which was managed in the following manner.

Lord Camden took notice, that he had gone through every department of the law, and therefore he considered himself as able to judge of such matters, exclusive of his title of peerage. He offered to maintain, that the doctrine laid down as the judgment of the court, was not the law of England; declared, that he was ready at any time to enter into the debate, and pressed his antagonist to appoint an early day for that purpose. He proposed several questions from the subject matter of the paper, evidently tending to bring it before the house, but all to no purpose, for his motion was over-ruled, and nothing farther was done in an affair of the utmost importance to the community. This occasioned much censure from the most sensible part of the people in general, because, had the lords decided what was law on this motion, it would have saved many disputes and litigations which may hereafter arise. By such a decision, we should have known what power our law has given to juries, and how far they are judges either of the law itself, or of such collateral evidence as arises out of the given fact.

It was next moved by one of the noble peers, that an address be presented to his majesty, humbly praying, that he would give orders to hasten our preparations, and to put our West-India settlements in a proper state of defence: that as we had the utmost reason to fear that the Spaniards would attack Gibraltar, therefore the garrison of that important fortress ought to be reinforced, and every method made use of for its security. While he was delivering his sentiments on this important subject, he was suddenly interrupted by a motion made to clear the house of all such as had not a right to sit there.

It was said, that when motions were brought in by surprise, and there was no previous notice given of what they might consist, and such things came out upon them which ought not to be divulged to any besides the noble persons concerned in them: that notes had been taken of what passed in the house; and that the enemy might have emissaries there; who would hear the weakness and nakedness of the nation exposed: that it was through indulgence only, that any besides peers were admitted, and the standing order for that purpose was called for and read.

On the other side, it was admitted, that any lord had a right to clear the house when he pleased; but that doing it upon this particular occasion would alarm the people; that they would imagine either public affairs to be in a worse situation than they were acquainted with, or that their proceedings were of such a nature, that they were afraid of making them public: that as the nobleman who had been speaking had not been charged with any act of disorder or impropriety, it was both insidious and irregular, under pretence of clearing the house, to interrupt him in the midst of a most excellent speech, which he was making on a subject of the utmost importance. Instead of an answer to these arguments, the house became one scene of confusion, nothing being heard but "Clear the house." A noble earl attempted several times to speak; but as none present would hear him, he called out, that if he was not allowed the privilege of a lord of parliament, he would retire from the house, which he accordingly did, and was followed by eighteen peers in a body; a circumstance which had scarce ever been known before.

Upon the departure of these lords, all the members of the house of commons who happened to be then present were ordered to withdraw, and then the confusion became general. Some of the commons called out, that they were come there, by order of their own house, to present some bills, upon which they were called to the bar; but no sooner had they delivered them, than they were ordered out of the house.

The seceding lords had gone into the house of commons, to hear the debates on a bill for the augmentation of the royal regiment of artillery; but no sooner had the members, who had been forced out of the house of peers, returned, and given an account in what what manner they had been treated, than the order of the house was read, and the peers were obliged to depart.

In the mean time, Mr. Harris, our ambassador at Madrid, was negotiating with the Spanish ministry, and expresses were daily passing between the courts of Great-Britain and Spain. It was observed, that the whole conduct of the Spanish ministry on this occasion was one continued act of duplicity and design; and whatever the causes were which operated to the prevention of a war, it does not appear that they are to be fought for in the pacific or friendly dispositions of the court of Madrid. The public opinion, which seems to have been well founded, attributed the convention to the mediation of France; and, it is probable, that the same internal causes which moved her to act as a mediator, were those which prevented her from taking an active part as an ally. It was thought that the power of the duke de Choiseul, who hurried on the war both at home and in Spain, began, at that time, to totter. Other councils prevailed, and that great minister was soon after stripped of all his employments, and obliged to retire to his country seat.

But whatever were the secret motives which induced the court of France to act in this manner, certain it is, that their preparations for war kept pace, for some time, with those in Spain. It would appear, that, the Christmas holidays coming on, there must have been some hopes of an accommodation taking place, especially as both houses of parliament adjourned to a later day than usual.

During the recess of parliament, Sir Edward Hawke resigned the place of first lord of the admiralty, and was succeeded in that important office by the earl of Sandwich. About the same time, some of those gentlemen who had been particularly attached to the late Mr. Grenville, and had, both as to acts and declarations, been among the most violent of those in opposition, now came over to the side of administration; and the earl of Suffolk was appointed keeper of the privy-seal, in the room of the earl of Halifax, who succeeded the earl of Sandwich as secretary of state for the northern department. Several other changes took place; Mr. Justice Bathurst received the great seal as high chancellor of Great-Britain, and was created a peer of England under the title of lord Apsley: Mr. De Grey, at that time attorney-general, was made chief justice of the common pleas, in room of Sir John E. Wilmot, who resigned: Mr. Thurlow was advanced to be attorney-general, and Mr. Wedderburne succeeded him as solicitor, being, at the same time, appointed cofferer to the queen. Such other changes as took place were all subordinate to these, and so connected with them, that it is needless to mention them in this place.

A.D. 1771. On the twenty-second of January, the parliament met, after a month's recess; and the same day prince Maferano, the Spanish ambassador, signed the declaration, with the earl of Rochford, secretary of state for the southern department. By this declaration, the Spanish ambassador, in the name of the king his master, disavows the violences offered at Port Egmont; and stipulated, that every thing should be restored there, in the same manner in which they were before the reduction took place. But, at the same time, he declared, that this restoration is not in any wise to affect the question, of the prior right of the sovereignty of these islands; and, by the acceptance, the performance of these stipulations is to be considered as a satisfaction for the injury done to the court of Great-Britain.

This transaction was immediately announced to both houses of parliament, and copies thereof were laid before them. It was then moved, that all the papers relating to the convention should be laid before the house, which was complied with, except in one instance, namely, that of keeping back such papers as contained the Spanish claims to Falkland Islands. This occasioned a warm debate, but the ministry screened themselves under pretence that all the offices had been searched, but no more papers could be found. It was, at the same time, charged upon the ministry, that the interference of France was a dishonour to Great-Britain; but the ministry denied the charge, by asserting, that France had never been employed to act as a mediator; but they would neither acknowledge or deny that she had acted in that character. It was then proposed to present an address of thanks to his majesty for ordering the papers to be laid before them, but this was objected to by the minority, who denied that all the papers had been laid before them. Warm debates ensued in both houses; but the ministerial party prevailed, and the address was presented without any amendment whatever.

The number of affairs that came before this sessions of parliament were of so important a nature that history would be deficient unless they were transmitted to posterity.

A most remarkable scene of corruption was, about this time, brought to light, by the committee appointed to determine contested elections; and, in particular, that of New Shoreham in Suffex. The matter of contest was, that the returning officer for that borough had returned a candidate with only thirty-seven votes, in preference to one who had eighty-seven, of which he doubted seventy-six; and so made his return without examining, as he ought to have done, whether they were legal voters or not.

In the course of the examination of witnesses it appeared, that a great number of the freemen had formed themselves into a society, which they called the Christian Club; the apparent ends of which institution were to promote acts of charity and benevolence, and to answer all such purposes as were in any ways consistent with the doctrines of our holy religion. But notwithstanding all these pretensions, they profaned the sacred name they had assumed, by carrying on the worst of purposes, and making a traffic of their oaths and consciences, and setting their borough to sale to the highest bidder; while the rest of the freemen were deprived of the privilege of giving their legal votes. The members of this infamous society, composed of the dregs of methodism, were bound to secrecy to each other by the most solemn oaths, and they had actually entered into written agreements never to divulge their secrets. A select committee was chosen from among the others, who were to manage, in private, all their black transactions; and, lest they should be detected in the act of perjury, they refused to vote at any election, under the stale pretence of scruple of conscience. But having received the wages of iniquity for their borough, they gave directions to the rest of the freemen who belonged to their society, in what manner to act. Thus by an act of the grossest equivocation, they attempted to impose both on God and man, and no sooner was the election over, than they shared the money among them, without any further scruple of conscience.

The returning officer had belonged to this society, but having taken some disgust at his companions in iniquity, he had, in consequence thereof, left their party. Being called before the committee he declared, that his reason for making such an unequal return was, that he knew, from his own own experience, that the majority of votes had taken bribes: nay, that they had even agreed to sell their borough to any one who would bid most for it. Upon these grounds, altho' they had boldly taken the oaths against bribery and corruption; yet he looked upon them as totally unqualified; and having taken the opinion of council, which, it seems, coincided with his own, he returned the candidate who had the smaller number of voters, as they were free from these objections. Upon these principles, and his not acting intentionally wrong, the returning officer vested his plea of justification, for the illegality of his conduct. As the assumption of such an act of power by a returning officer, upon whatever whatever principle it was founded, would, however, have been a precedent of the most dangerous tendency, he was accordingly taken into custody; but in consideration of the circumstances in his favour, and of his bringing so infamous a transaction to light, he was discharged, after receiving a reprimand on his knees from the speaker at the bar of the house.

As this combination at Shoreham was of too flagrant a nature to be overlooked, and the select committee not having powers to proceed any further, they reported the whole matter to the house, and moved that they would make a further enquiry into it. All those who wished well to the constitution, were glad of this opportunity of displaying their eloquence, and an act passed, by which eighty-one free-men of the borough of Shoreham, were rendered incapable of voting at any election, and the attorney-general was ordered to prosecute all the members of the Christian Club.

The next thing that came before parliament, was of a very important nature to the subjects in general, namely, the manner in which the crown lands could be given away by the sovereign to any of his subjects; and how soon he could again seize on them, or whether he could seize them at all.

To understand this matter right, the reader must consider that in former times, under the feudal law, our kings had lands assigned them for their support, instead of money; part of which they often bestowed upon their favourites, reserving only a quit-rent as an acknowledgment of subjection. By these means the kings of this realm acquired the most solid power, while, at the same time, they exhausted the sources from whence their support naturally flowed. But as many disputes had arisen concerning the right of possession in those to whom the crown-lands had been granted; an act passed in the reign of James I. that every person to whom the king should dispose away any of the crown-lands, should, after sixty-one years possession of them, by himself and his heirs, enjoy them without molestation for ever, in the same manner as if they were freehold.

This was a fine engine in the hands of princes who wanted to govern by parties, and thus we find, that at the restoration of Charles II. when that prince, by a solemn act, gave up all claim to wardships and reliefs, the commons granted him a large sum of money for his annual subsistence. The extravagance of Charles, in consequence of his attachment to pleasure, induced him to give away many of the crown-lands; and his example was followed by king William after the revolution.

Mr. Bentinck, the great favourite of king William, had been naturalized, and the king made him a grant of some lands in Cumberland, which gave great offence to some of the English nobility. Accordingly, a bill was brought in during the reign of queen Anne, and passed into a law, ordaining, that for the future, no grants should be made of crown-lands, without reserving one fourth of the rent to the crown. Nothing, however, material happened in consequence of this act till the year 1768, when the duke of Grafton, then at the head of the treasury, made a grant of the duke of Portland's estates in Cumberland to Sir James Lowther, without conforming to the act of queen Anne, by reserving one fourth to the crown.

This was a most alarming circumstance, because many of the principal estates of our nobility and gentry were held by grants of crown-lands; and that if Sir James Lowther's claim should be sustained, no person could look upon himself in peaceable possession of any thing that had originally belonged to the crown. It was the general opinion at that time, that this grant had been made to serve some election purposes; but these being now over, it was supposed the matter would drop of course. In this, however, they were disappointed; for an expensive law-suit was commenced, the whole county of Cumberland was in an uproar, four hundred ejectments were served in one day. A motion was then made for bringing in a bill to quiet the subjects in the peaceable possession of their estates; and that it should extend to the proprietors of land throughout every part of the kingdom, according to the statutes already made.

This is what is called the Nullum Tempus bill, and at first it passed through the house by a considerable majority; on the second reading it likewise passed, though with a small majority; but when it came to the third reading, it was rejected by a majority of nine votes, the whole ministerial influence having been thrown in to defeat it. This conduct of the ministry was much censured by the people in general, especially as it was a matter of dispute concerning private property, with which they had no business to interfere.

It was insinuated and even declared in public that the ministry had written circular letters to all the members who had the least dependence on the court, commanding them to oppose the bill, under the penalty of losing their places; and thus by the rejection of an act of a most equitable nature, the ministry have it all times in their power to make those who hold lands of the crown, subservient to their designs, and to oblige them to vote according to their directions, although contrary to the dictates of reason and conscience.

The last thing done by this parliament during the present sessions was, the passing an act to keep up an armed force in the East-Indies, and some restrictions were put upon the company, in order to keep them more dependent on our government. At last, after transacting a great variety of business, of the most important nature, his majesty went to the house and put an end to the sessions on the eighth of May. In the speech from the throne it was observed, that the pacific disposition of the kings of France and Spain furnished an opportunity for disbanding some of the forces both by sea and land. The commons were thanked for the generous manner in which they had granted the supplies; and that was considered as the strongest mark of their attachment to his majesty's person, family and government. The speech concluded, by recommending to their serious attention, the suppression of all riots and tumults which were become so frequent in most parts of the kingdom.

Having attended to the parliamentary affairs of Britain, we must now look back to the continent of Europe, where the war on the Danube seemed to languish in the beginning of the campaign. The great victories obtained by the Russians were not without much bloodshed on their side, and the loss of men by sickness, and all the other casualties that constantly attend the carrying on a war in a distant country were prodigious. The neighbouring provinces were ruined, so as to resemble a desert, and that no subsistence could be procured, but at an enormous expence. Money was borrowed in other countries for the use of the Russians, at the most exorbitant interest, and in some parts the merchants refused to advance any; so that it is impossible to describe the hardships the Russian army suffered. In March a most bloody battle was fought between them and the Turks, on the Walachian side of the Danube; and general Weissman, having obtained a victory, crossed the river, where the enemy had some small parties; but the general drove them from their posts and destroyed their magazines.

The two grand objects the Russians had in view at the opening of this campaign were, the securing such conquests as they had made on the Danube, and at the same time to penetrate with one of their armies into Crim Tartary.

Crim Tartary, so famous among the ancient Greeks by the name of Taurica Cheronesus, is a peninsula surrounded on all sides by the Euxine or Black Sea, except where it joins little Tartary, by a small isthmus not above six miles broad. In this isthmus stood the ancient city of Precop; but the Turks have changed changed the names of those once celebrated places, which were formerly the seats of learning and arts. The whole peninsula is one of the most fertile spots in the world, abounding with many towns and cities; and the entrance, near where Precop stood, is fortified by strong lines, with a trench forty-two feet deep, seventy-two broad, and from the bottom of the ditch to the crest of the parapet, was seventy feet. Strong towers had been erected at proper distances from each other, and strong cannon were placed upon them.

Prince Dolgorucki was the Russian general appointed to attack this place, and when he arrived before the lines, he found it defended by the chan Selim Guery in person, with an army of fifty thousand Tartars, and seven thousand Turks. But notwithstanding the difference of numbers, the prince attacked the place on the twenty-fifth of June, two days after their arrival. The Tartar prince behaved with great bravery; for finding it impossible to rally his right wing, he went and charged bravely at the head of his left. All his efforts, however, were in vain; for in four hours his whole army was routed, and the lines forced in every place. The Turkish garrison surrendered prisoners of war the next day; and their whole army, cannon, ammunition, and baggage, fell into the hands of the conquerors. From this circumstance the reader will see, that no fortifications, however strong, nor troops, however courageous, can hold out against cool, steady, regular discipline, which, although it may sometimes be slow, yet in the end it bears down all opposition.

The Russians, having made themselves masters of this important pass, over-run the whole of the peninsula; the Turkish garrison deserted Kostoff, and having destroyed the fortifications, embarked on board some ships that lay in the harbour, and set sail for their own country. The governor of Arabat made some defence; but the place was taken by storm, and the garrison put the sword. From thence the prince continued his march to Cassa, the capital city of the Crimea, which was immediately surrendered to him; and a thousand men, the remains of the garrison, were made prisoners of war.

The terror was now so great, that the Turks, without waiting for the arrival of the enemy, abandoned the important fortresses of Taman, Jenicola, and Kertsch, which commanded the straits between the Black Sea and the town of Azoph, which now fell into the hands of the Russians, without striking a single blow. The Tartars submitted to the conquerors, who took them under their immediate protection; while their unfortunate leader retired to Constantinople, where he soon after died, not without strong suspicion that he had been put to death in a private manner.

During these transactions in the Crimea, the Turks, under the command of Mousson Oglou, crossed the Danube in three divisions, in order to attempt to relieve the fort of Torre, situated on the north of that river opposite to the ancient city of Nicopolis. The Turkish army, however, did not succeed; but a detachment of them, under the command of a bassaw, attacked the strong fort of Guirgewo, in which was a Russian garrison, and in three days the governor agreed to capitulate, upon being allowed to march out with all the honours of war. As this place was very strong, and had cost the Russians much trouble and loss before they took it, so the conduct of the governor filled the minds of the army with indignation, and prince Repuin ordered all the officers to be put under arrest.

On the seventeenth of August a detachment of the Turks came up with a body of Russians, and the latter were, after a most obstinate defence, put to flight; but they retreated in the most excellent order, taking along with them their wounded men. This was the only field action in which the Turks had hitherto reaped any advantage, and it was magnified at Constantinople as if it had been a complete victory.

The Turks had nothing so much at heart as that of establishing winter quarters in Walachia; and with this view they continued crossing the Danube in detached parties. But these motions could not escape the notice of a general so vigilant and penetrating as Romanzow; who no sooner perceived their designs, than he made such a number of masterly dispositions, as not only overthrew their schemes; but were conducted with such ability, that every one of them took place at the instant of time, and was productive of the effect which was intended.

Instead, therefore, of waiting for the enemy, the Russians boldly crossed the Danube; and attacked them on their own side, a circumstance they had not so much as imagined. Two great bodies of Turks, one entrenched at Tulcza; and the other at Maczin, were attacked at the same time by the Russian generals Weisman and Miboradowitz, and the event was the same in both places. The entrenchments were stormed; the Turks totally routed; and the towns taken, in which were large magazines of arms and provisions.

The night following, general Weisman marched to attack the grand vizier's camp, which was strongly fortified, at a place called Babadagh; and in it was the flower of the Turkish army, covered with a strong train of artillery. Victory, however, was obtained here by the Russians as cheap as before; the Turks were routed with great slaughter; the entrenchments and artillery taken, with the castle of Babadagh; while the vizier and his ruined army fled thirty miles, to seek refuge in mount Hemnus.

A few days after this important event, general Essen attacked a large body of Turks, and totally routed them, after having killed two thousand; and taken four thousand prisoners, besides all their baggage, tents, artillery, waggons, ammunition and provisions. By these rapid successes, the Turks were driven out of Walachia, while the Russians remained masters of that province. When the news arrived at Constantinople, the people became quite outrageous; and would have proceeded to great extremities, had they not been made to believe, that the loss was owing to a mutiny which had taken place in the army.

During this year, the Russian fleet in the Mediterranean did not perform any thing remarkable; and the severe check given the Greeks had deterred the more sober from engaging in the war. The fleet was greatly distressed for want of provisions; and some of their ships having been sent to the Italian ports, to purchase such things as were wanting, they were refused admittance, under pretence that they were infected with the plague. But still, under all these disadvantages, and many others, the Russians, by falling in with a pitiful, cowardly enemy, struck unspeakable terror in the Levant; and made even the Grand Signior tremble on his throne. A most severe blow was given to the trade of the Levant; and throughout all the islands of the Archipelago, the coasts of Greece and Asia; nothing was to be seen but ruin and desolation: but notwithstanding, the Russians reaped but very few advantages, and the climate killed many more of their men than those who fell by the sword.

Whilst war was thus carried on, between those rude and wide-extended empires, and appeared exposed rather to exterminate than diminish the human race, the pestilence, that other dreadful enemy to mankind, claimed a share of the spoil, and seemed too impatient to wait for the gleanings of the sword. When we consider the havoc made by this dreadful disorder in the Turkish army, and that all the provinces near the Black Sea were more or less infected with it, it will appear little less than a miracle that the Russian army should have escaped the fatal contagion. But if their army was so fortunate as to escape, it was not so happy with the interior part of their empire. It first discovered itself in the imperial city of Moscow; but as it was many hundreds of miles from the theatres of the war, and from the countries infected, it could not be reasonably supposed that it had been communicated from thence. It raged during the summer under the appearance of a malignant fever, but in autumn it assumed its true form, and swept away many thousands before it.

The cruel ravages of the disorder were not, however, more shocking to humanity, than the effects it produced on the minds of the barbarous people. The severity of government had been, in some measure, relaxed, and the most horrid licentiousness took place. A wild enthusiast pretended that he had a revelation from heaven, by which he was informed, that a certain image of a saint was endowed with efficacy sufficient to cure those who were infected, and to preserve those who were not. This drew innumerable crowds of people together, so that many thousands were trampled to death, and the sick dropped down dead in the midst of such as were healthy. Thus the contagion was communicated in such a manner, that no attempts could restrain its progress; while the populace, assembling in such numerous bodies, broke out into the most violent outrages.

The artful impostor, who contrived the fraud, had placed a chest before the image of the saint, to receive such money as the people gave; but the archbishop of Moscow, who seems to have been a prudent man, ordered the chest to be sealed up, and both it and the image of the saint removed out of the church. This act, which deserved the highest commendations, had a quite different effect on the ignorant and superstitious multitude, for they ran to the archbishop's house, and utterly demolished it. The good prelate had escaped, through a back door, to one of the monasteries, where he hoped to be protected; but thither the enraged multitude followed him, and dragging the venerable old man into the streets, put him to death in the most horrid and barbarous manner.

A body of troops having been sent to quell the rioters, they refused to disperse; upon which the soldiers fired upon them, and many hundreds of them were killed. Many prisoners were taken, and being brought to their trials, were punished according to the custom of the country. The most remarkable circumstance attending this tragical affair, was the murder of the good old archbishop, for the Russians regard their clergy in a more sacred manner than any other nation in Europe; but who can set bounds to enthusiasm, when urged on by the violence of a pestilential distemper?

During the whole of this year, the great kingdom of Poland was deluged with blood, from the one extremity to the other: the confederates became more and more inveterate against each other, and yet the fertility of the soil furnished the means of subsistence. Indeed, it may be justly said, that the Russian ambassador was the sovereign of Poland, for all orders issued from him, though they were sanctified with the name of the king. From this circumstance we may learn what an unhappy thing it is to be under an aristocratical government, where the king is elected by a select company of noblemen, who pay no regard to his power, and, in the mean time, make slaves of their own tenants. In short, there cannot be a more perfect form of government than that where all the powers in the state are put upon an equal balance.

In the mean time, the king of Poland, who had been raised to the throne from a private station, supported himself under his misfortunes with the most heroic fortitude. Conscious of the moral rectitude of his own heart, he did not even suspect that his enemies had the least intention to do him any injury; but he was mistaken, as will appear from the following narrative.

About ten in the evening of the third of November, the king, having been on a visit to a nobleman in the country; returned to his palace at Warsaw; but, just as his coach was turning the end of a street, it was beset by several armed men on horseback, the chief of whom was Koczinski, an officer among the confederates. These desperadoes having fired their pistols into the coach, dragged out the king, and carried him off between two horsemen. The domestics who attended the coach did all they could to rescue the king, but in vain, for one was killed on the spot, and the rest desperately wounded.

The Russian soldiers ran to arms, and found the coach covered with blood, but could learn no accounts of the king; upon which they sallied forth, and alarmed the detached parties which were on the roads leading to the capital. The assassins had been joined by some of their accomplices at one of the gates, and, without stopping, rode off with the king till they came to the village of Willanow, about seven English miles distant from Warsaw. The Russians continued pursuing; upon which Koczinski, with four others, separated from the rest of his companions, carrying the king with him. When he had proceeded a few miles, he sent his four companions to procure intelligence, whether any of the Russian forces were advancing; and no sooner were they gone, than he fell at the king's feet, imploring his pardon, and, at the same time, offering to save his life. They then proceeded to a hut about a mile distant, from whence the king dispatched a messenger to the Russian general, who sent proper persons to attend him, and conduct him home. The king had received two wounds on his head, the one from a sword, and the other from a ball; and his escaping with life may be considered as one of the most extraordinary incidents we meet with in history.

The assassin Koczinski produced a paper, by which it appeared, that he and his confederates were bound by the most solemn oaths to deliver the king, dead or alive, to the confederacy at Czenstochau; but, as he said, his heart failed him, and he was seized with remorse as soon as he saw the bleeding wounds of his sovereign. This, however, will hardly be credited by any person acquainted with human nature, but his reasons for giving him up were merely to save his own life.

It is evident, that the manner in which the king was carried off was attended with much more difficulty than if they had killed him on the spot; but then it must be remembered, that no persons in the world are more bewildered in their minds than those who engage in unlawful schemes: they are bold and resolute in words; but no sooner have they lifted their hands, than all the dreadful consequences present themselves to their minds, and they are unable to proceed any farther. Indeed, the whole of this assassin's conduct shews, that the mind of man has an inherent disposition to virtue; and that, however it may be warped and depraved, and think itself, while at a distance, capable of committing the most enormous crimes, yet it will frequently shrink back with horror, and recover its original disposition, when it comes to the fatal period.

While Poland remained in this distracted state, the empress of Russia, the emperor of Germany, and the ever enterprising king of Prussia, were not idle; they resolved to avail themselves of such circumstances, and divide that unhappy kingdom, by each taking a part; but this greatly offended the Germans, who were afraid of having the Russians too near them.

While Greece and Poland were over-run with armies, Germany, especially towards the south and east, was suffering all those calamities which arise from the scarcity of provisions. This dearth was not artificial, but real; for in Bohemia the scarcity was so great, that a severe famine prevailed, and great numbers of people perished for want of food. These distresses were much heightened by the severity of the winter, for in many places the poor people stripped the thatch from off their houses, in order to feed their cattle with it. Nor was the spring more favourable, for the vast quantities of snow which melted on the mountains, fell down in torrents on the level country, and swept away every thing before it; and the the great rivers having burst through their ancient boundaries, scenes of confusion, terror and distress, were spread on every side. The calamity continued to increase as the season advanced; and in summer, when the best weather is expected, nothing was to be seen but continual rains, so that the country seemed to resemble the ocean, rather than land for the habitation of men.

The inundations of the Elbe were particularly dreadful; many parts of Lower Saxony, and the march of Brandenburg, were totally ruined. The town of Hamburg was truly distressed: the inundation entered one of the gates, and threatened immediate destruction; so that every person in the place was obliged to assist, in order to divert its course, and prevent its farther progress. The great suburb towards the Elbe, where the gentry had their houses and gardens, was so covered with water, that only the tops of the trees could be seen. The magistrates ordered a public fast to be kept, to implore the divine mercy, and avert the threatened judgments.

At Prague, a riot having happened, in consequence of the scarcity of provisions, the governor told the people, that unless they dispersed, he would order the troops to fire upon them; to which they answered, with great coolness and indifference, that they would look upon the execution of his threatenings as a favour, a sudden death by a shot being much preferable to a slow one by famine. The governor had humanity and prudence enough to refrain from fulfilling his threats; and having transmitted an account of these transactions to the empress-queen, she burst into tears, and immediately sent them all the relief that was in her power.

On the twelfth of February this year, the king of Sweden died suddenly, and was succeeded by his son, the present king, then at Paris on his travels. The senate of Sweden met, and having drawn up the common diploma, by which the prince was invested with the regal dignity, expresses were dispatched to him at Paris, to notify the news in form, and desire his majesty would return to his own dominions. He did not, however, leave Paris, till he had concluded a treaty with the French king, and then he set out, accompanied by his brother. At Berlin he spent a few days in close conference with his uncle, the king of Prussia; and then continued his journey to Stockholm, where he was received amidst the acclamations of his subjects.

During this year, one of the most remarkable revolutions in the internal government of France took place, of any we find mentioned in history. That faithful, uncorrupted body of men, the parliament of Paris, had long defended the liberties of their fellow subjects; but integrity, and every other virtue, are little regarded by lawless power. The king, having sent for the members to the palace, ordered them to register some iniquitous edicts; but they absolutely refused, and returning to the parliament-house, entered into a bond to stand by each other in doing justice, although the consequence should be death.

A body of dragoons surrounded the parliament-house, and forced the clerks to register the edicts; upon which the parliament protested against it, and deputed their first president to wait on the king. But all the answer they received from the haughty monarch was, that next day they should be all sent into banishment. This accordingly took place, and these venerable fathers and guardians of the laws were sent to different villages at a great distance from their friends and families. Such was the fate of this noble and disinterested assembly, whose actions would have done honour to a Roman senate. This fall was not more glorious from the cause in which it was engaged, than from the circumstances which attended it; for several of the other parliaments in the provinces resigned their offices in honour of that of Paris.

With respect to the state of parties in England during the long recess of parliament, several changes gradually took place. Most of the party known by the name of Grenvilles had gone over to the court, so that the ministry acquired a considerable degree of strength, while many others in the opposition relinquished their attachment to any parties whatever. Indeed, in all those parties formed for opposing the measures of government, we still find them inferior to those attached to the court; but that is not the worst that sometimes happens; for dissensions taking place, will ruin the best societies which were ever yet established. Many gentlemen, however, who scorned to mix private resentment against any individual with what concerned the public, remained firm in their principles; but seeing every thing carried by a great majority, in favour of what appeared to them inconsistent with the rights of their country, became wearied with fruitless attendance, while there was not the least appearance of redress.

One event took place during this recess, which surprized the whole nation, and made way for an act, the next session, of a most extraordinary nature. The event alluded to was no other than the marriage of his royal highness the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady, and daughter to lord Inham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This step of the duke's gave great offence at court, especially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not concealed in the same manner as the marriage of the duke of Gloucester with the countess dowager of Waldegrave.

A. D. 1772. On the twenty-first day of January, the parliament met; and his majesty, in his speech, expressed much satisfaction, that neither the foreign nor domestic state of affairs required their more early attendance: that, now they were assembled, they would, no doubt, attend to the interests of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its foreign commerce. They were likewise informed, that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on the best terms with that court. It was, however, recommended to them, to keep the navy on the most respectable footing; to be ready in case of any necessity for the future. The addresses were presented in the usual form; and then the public business was opened, by making proper inquiries into the state of the navy; and the ministry proposed, that twenty-five thousand seamen should be voted for the service of the current year. In support of this motion, it was urged by the ministry, that the French had sent a considerable fleet to the East-Indies; and that we were, on that account, obliged to support a more considerable naval force there than before: that a large squadron was employed in the protection of our West-India islands; for should any misunderstanding arise between us and the Spaniards, those valuable acquisitions, if not properly taken care of, would fall into the hands of our enemies: that the war between the Russians and Turks made it also necessary to employ a greater number of ships for the protection of our commerce in the Mediterranean and the Archipelago; than had been customary in times of general peace: that by keeping up a reputable body of seamen, we would not be under the cruel necessity of granting press-warrants in case of the breaking out of a new war; and although the expense might be more than is common in times of peace, the advantages would amply repay it.

To these arguments it was answered by those in opposition, that the nation was already groaning under a load of taxes; and, instead of doing or proposing any thing for paying off the national debt, here was a proposal made to increase it in a time of profound peace; that, allowing the exigencies of the times required it, yet it did not appear but that, on every future occasion, the same pretence might be made, whether there was any necessity for it or not.

Two of our greatest naval commanders strongly opposed the motion, and condemned the then present arrangement of the fleet. They observed, that the force already in the East-Indies was either too great or too little: that if the appearances of a permanent peace, as held out in the speech, were to be relied on, it was too great, and, in case of war, it was insufficient: that the same objections lay to the arrangement at Jamaica, where the squadron consisted only of about four ships, and was altogether unable to protect it, supposing any danger of an attack. Many severe sarcasms were levelled at the ministry for the futility of their conduct, because they accompanied a speech which breathed nothing but sentiments of peace, with all the actual preparation for war. At last, the question having been put, the motion was carried as usual, and the ministry reigned triumphant.

The next business that came before the house was a petition for leave to bring in a bill to excuse some of the clergy from subscribing to the thirty-nine articles of religion. It was urged in favour of the motion, that Christ came to make all his followers free: that they could not subscribe to doctrines of human invention, but only to the sacred scriptures; and that it was their right to explain them according to what they esteemed their genuine sense and meaning. On the other hand, it was urged against the motion, that to grant such an indulgence would be to open a door for all sorts of licentiousness; for, under a pretence that such and such tenets were the pure dictates of conscience, the fundamental doctrines of our religion would be subverted, and blasphemy taught in our churches: that most of those who had associated at the Feathers Tavern upon this sinister business, had been formerly dissenters, but had left their original profession, in order to enjoy some of the spoils of the church, and that they had brought their Arian and Socinian notions along with them: that if their consciences were so very tender, they might throw up their livings, and return to their conventicles, where they would be at liberty to disseminate what notions they pleased: that, by doing so, they would give a convincing proof of their disinterestedness; but nothing could be more reasonable, than for a church established by law to bestow her honours upon those who subscribed her doctrines, and conformed to her discipline. Upon the whole, the motion was rejected by a great majority, and not without some severe strictures on the conduct of those who had promoted it.

But of all the business transacted during this session, none was considered as of such importance, or made greater noise, than that of a message sent by his majesty to the house of lords. In this message it was observed, that his majesty being desirous, from paternal affection to his own family, an anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, as a matter of public concern, had always belonged to the princes of this realm. He therefore recommended to both houses to take it into their serious consideration, whether it may not be wise and expedient to supply the defects of the laws now in being, and, by some new provision, more effectually guard the descendants of his late majesty, except such as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majesty, his heirs and successors, first had and obtained.

In consequence of this message, a bill was brought into the house of lords, which fully answered all the purposes intended. This bill was opposed, with great strength of argument, by some of the most respectable peers in the nation. All the judges were sent for to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the immediate branches of the royal family must be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches, they could not say. At last the motion was carried, though not till fourteen lords entered a protest against it, as being inconsistent with the law of nature.

In the house of commons, the bill met with a much stronger opposition; and those in opposition boldly declared, that it had been brought in at a time when most of the gentlemen of the law, whose opinions would have been of great service, were gone on the circuits. But, notwithstanding all the strength of argument, it passed, and soon after received the royal assent. All that we shall say concerning this bill shall be reduced to a few words. By those who promoted it, it was said, that, abstracting from all principles of natural right, it was necessary that municipal institutions should take place, especially where the public safety was concerned: that during the distractions between the houses of York and Lancaster, some branches of the royal family had married in the most imprudent manner with the daughters and widows of subjects, which was attended with such a train of evils, that the whole nation was deluged in blood: that, properly speaking, no attempt had been made to set aside natural rights, any further than was absolutely necessary to preserve the public peace, which was much preferable to the state of individuals.

On the other hand, it was urged, that all mankind, in the act of marriage, are, by nature, free: that no marriage can ever be a real, legal one, where the consent of the parties has not first been obtained: that no political laws can set aside natural rights: that if choice alone can constitute a real marriage, then nothing can authorize the most dignified person in the universe to lay a restraint on any person whatever. It was urged further, that such an unlimited power given to the sovereign, was, in all respects, inconsistent with the constitution, nor was there one precedent in history to give countenance to it: that, had it been inherent as a principle in our constitution, it must have long since become the subject matter of many of our statutes: that, on the contrary, till the present time, this prerogative was unheard of in English jurisprudence: that there was no remedy in law appertaining to such pretended right in the crown, nor any court of law in which a prosecution could be carried on for such pretended offences; and as, therefore, there could be no right without a remedy, it was evident this prerogative could have no real existence: that the act which regulated other marriages, expressly excepted the royal family; and it is well known, that the common law, until that period, left all men to their natural liberty. Had it been otherwise, had any provision been made, or had the paternal authority, exercised in Rome, been a part of our constitution, such a statute would have been both absurd and ridiculous, because useless and unnecessary. Such were the arguments made use of in this debate, and the reader is left to draw from them what conclusions he pleases.

The petition to parliament relating to dispensation with the subscription to the thirty-nine articles, being dismissed, so far as it related to churchmen in general, the dissenters resolved to try the same method.

It happened that, in the late debate, some favourable expressions had been made use of with respect to the dissenters, in opposition to those who treated them with scurrility. It was considered as a hardship that they should be obliged, under pains and penalties, to subscribe the doctrinal articles of the church of England, especially as they received no emolument from the civil power, besides that of protection. Some of the members in the house of commons promised to do every thing in their power to promote a bill for their relief, which occasioned a meeting of some of the chiefs among the dissenters. It is necessary to observe, that, by the act of toleration of the first of William and Mary, the dissenters, who had suffered much during the former reigns, gained a legal right to the exercise of divine worship in their own manner; but this right was conditional with respect to their ministers, schoolmasters, and private tutors, who were obliged to subscribe the doctrinal parts of the articles, otherwise they were subject to very severe penalties.

As the dissenters were strongly attached to the doctrinal parts of the articles when the act took place, the subscription was not considered as a grievance, it being worship and discipline alone which constituted the the great line of destination between them. However, since that period, a remarkable change has taken place in the sentiments of those people, and there are but few of them now in England who have not run into violent extremes. Those who considered subscription as a hardship, have been accused of teaching the doctrines of Annus and Socinus; while those who still adhere to the doctrines of Calvin, have carried the notions of that reformer more high than ever he intended.

It is true, that some of these Calvinistical divines, joined with those in opposite sentiments, in signing a petition to parliament; but, at the same time, a number of persons, among whom were some common mechanics who had turned preachers, joined in a counter-petition, praying that the clause in the act of toleration, that requires subscription to the articles, should not be on any consideration dispensed with. The arguments made use of on this occasion were nearly the same with those relating to the established church; but the debate was carried on with greater spirit.

Natural and religious liberty were contended for on the one hand, and the rights of the church on the other. Some severe sarcasms were thrown out on the high-church party, by those who supported the bill; and, in a very illiberal manner, they were charged with those blemishes that had stained the characters of their ancestors.

On the other hand nothing was lost; for the high-churchmen retaliated, by charging the dissenters with all the blood shed during the civil wars in the last century, and also with putting the king to death after they had overturned the government in church and state. To this they added, that instead of walking in the rigid road of Calvinism, like their hypocritical ancestors, they had pulled off the mask, some were such professed Arians that they had written against the divinity of Christ; others had denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost; but the major part had gone very near to deism. Some of them had falsified the text of the New Testament, to favour their heretical notions; and others had denied the certainty of punishment hereafter. In a word, it was said, that they were an epitome of all the heresies that ever existed, and to grant them the requested indulgence, would be to open a door for all sorts of blasphemy.

Such, in general, were the outlines of the arguments on this bill in the house of commons; and, at last it passed by a small majority. However, when it came to the house of lords, it had a more severe trial to undergo; for although the English nobility are enemies to persecution, yet there are few among them who would grant that indulgence to dissenters which is denied to their own clergy. Upon the second reading of it in the house of lords, there were no less than one hundred and thirty-one peers, including proxies; and only twenty-nine of these supported the bill; so that it was thrown out, and the dissenters left in the same state as before.

The affairs of the East-India company were now in a very perplexed situation, and it had been recommended in the speech from the throne, at the opening of the session, that some enquiry should be made into them. However, it seems pretty evident, that administration had no serious intention of entering deeply into that matter for the present; and that the movements during the sessions were only made use of to keep it alive, and to make or find some colour for bringing about a revolution, or total change in the affairs of that opulent company, which were now entangled in a labyrinth of uncertainty.

On the thirtieth of March, the deputy-chairman of the East-India company moved the house for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the servants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to restrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the servants belonging to the company from carrying on any sort of trade, and to give the directors of the company a sovereign power over their own servants.

It was urged in support of the motion, that the bad state of affairs in India, was owing to the small power the court of directors had over their servants, as they could not punish them in any other manner than by dismissing them. That nothing was more inconsistent with true policy, than to suffer governors of provinces at a great distance, to become traders and merchants; and that the court of Bengal was not able to administer justice to all the other settlements.

In answer to this it was said, that it was an unpardonable thing to propose bringing in a bill to redress a grievance without producing sufficient proof that the grievance existed. That the house ought first to enter into an enquiry concerning our present situation of affairs in India, and the causes that led to it; that it was to be feared the enquiry would shew, that the evils lay too deep to be remedied by the proposed bill, that it would be almost impossible to prevent the company's servants from trading either directly or indirectly; and that the sending out some gentlemen learned in the laws as judges, was very inadequate to the purpose of administering justice to the people, in such a vast extended tract of land; and that the measure was premature, because we had not yet determined by what code of laws the people were to be governed.

The motion, however, was carried, and this led to an enquiry into the state of affairs in India. All the papers belonging to the company, were ordered to be laid before a select committee of the house, and from the perusal of them, many important discoveries were made. Indeed, it was found that the mode of government in India was in every respect arbitrary, unconstitutional, and no way fit for preserving the rights of the people, nor administering justice to individuals. This committee, finding the business encreasing fast, and the season far advanced, desired leave to continue sitting during the recess of parliament, or, at least, till such time as they could go through with the intended enquiry.

In the mean time, the ill temper which had so unaccountably taken place between the two houses during the preceding session, still continued during the present; and, except in transmitting of bills from the one to the other, there was no more communication between them, than if they had been the jealous councils of two rival states.

In this state of affairs, the lords having sent a bill to the commons by a master in chancery, and a clerk assistant, the whole house considered it as an indignity, and would not accept the message till they had examined the journals, to know if there were any precedents of sending bills in that manner. In the course of a hasty and passionate debate, which ensued upon this occasion, several gentlemen mentioned, that, on the first day of the present sessions, they had been rudely turned out of the house of lords, even before the speaker could get out of the door. A motion was then made to appoint a committee to search for precedents, of the manner of bills being sent from the lords, and also of the improper behaviour of the lords to the commons. Exceptions, however, were taken to the word improper, as if it had carried an appearance of prejudging the case; and, after a warm debate, the word was left out.

The report of the committee was, that the lords had behaved in a very improper manner, and that the bill, which still lay on the table, should be sent back. This was opposed by administration, who said it would lay a foundation for a quarrel, which might not be easily accommodated; and accordingly the motion was over-ruled.

A motion was then made for a conference with the lords, but over-ruled in the same manner as the other; and after long debates, and several proposed amendments, the matter ended in a message to the lords, in which the impropriety of the messengers was the only complaint stated, which, it was hoped, would not be drawn into a precedent. This produced an answer, that the bill had been ordered in the usual manner, and that the matter of complaint was occasioned by the illness of one of the persons who should have presented it; that a good correspondence was wished for, and that it was not meant to introduce any precedent contrary to established usage.

On the ninth of June, his majesty came to the house of peers, and, in his speech from the throne, took notice of the laudable conduct of his parliament, that had conducted the affairs of the public with such spirit and prudence. He thanked them for the care they had taken of his family, in making the act relating to the royal family; and they were informed of the pacific disposition of those powers with whom we had any concern. That there was great reason to believe, that the public tranquillity would not be disturbed. As for the supplies granted by the commons, they were thanked in the most cordial manner; and great joy was expressed, that there were still some hopes of being able to reduce the national debt.

No doubt was made but they would carry to their respective countries, the same principles and the same zeal for the public good, which they had already manifested; and that they would cultivate a spirit of harmony and confidence among all ranks of the people; to convince them, that without a due reverence for the laws, neither their civil or religious rights could be enjoyed in comfort or security; and to assure them, that their interests were considered as inseparably connected with those of the crown; and that his majesty is, and ever was persuaded, that the prosperity and glory of his reign must depend on his possessing the affections, and maintaining the happiness of his people. The parliament was then prorogued; which leads us, during its recess, to consider the state of affairs on the continent. The first thing that engages our attention is, the revolution that took place in the government of Sweden.

It is acknowledged, by most of those who have written of Sweden, that no nation in general ever enjoyed more liberty. Though governed by kings, these kings were originally elected by the people, and their power circumscribed within very narrow limits. The senate, in a manner, exercised the whole executive power; and the general diets, composed of representatives from the nobility, clergy, burgesses, and peasants. Here we find a happy mixture of power, and such as had not been known in any other European nation these many years; for all ranks of people were represented in their diets, or parliaments. It was not, however, without its defects; for the power of the diet being great, such as composed it often played the tyrant over their dependents or tenants, which made the people wish for a change of government.

About the time of the reformation, the popish clergy in Sweden had become so odious to the people, that they embraced the doctrines of Luther, and the protestant religion was established among them. From that time forward, Sweden began to emerge from obscurity; and several worthy princes having, for about a century, conducted the affairs of government, it became at last a flourishing nation. But good princes are not of continual succession. Charles XI. was a bold, domineering tyrant, and joining cunning to the natural cruelty of his disposition, he soon abolished the power of the senate by assuming it to himself, while the states were forced, by a military power, to give up all pretence to legislation. By the same, or similar methods, he greatly enlarged the dominions of Sweden, by new conquests; and, at his death in 1696, left it one of the most powerful kingdoms in Europe. He was succeeded by his son Charles XII. who inherited the intrepidity, obstinacy, harshness, and violence of his father, without any of his diffimulation. He carried despotism to a still greater height; for, he threw by all the forms of law, and decided prepotently in every thing, without admitting of any discussion. The events of this prince's life are too well known to be recited here, only that his invincible obstinacy, and implacable disposition, brought on his ruin, after a life spent in heroic adventures and absurd pursuits, which seemed to border on madness. He found his nation when he ascended the throne, at the highest pitch of glory; but he left it reduced to misery.

His sister received the crown from the states and the senate, to be held by her in the same manner as in ancient times; so that from the blessings of a mild government, the nation began to assume a new form, and to recover from the miseries into which it had been plunged. In this manner things had been conducted with great prudence, till the death of the late king; and his present majesty, when he ascended the throne, made such protestations of his doing nothing without their advice and consent, that those persons who are well acquainted with the heart of man, and the common occurrences of life, would have imagined that he intended to deceive.

But notwithstanding all these plausible pretences and the strenuous endeavours of the court party, no relaxation could be obtained in the articles which restricts the regal power, although the coronation had been delayed a considerable time for that purpose. The king was obliged to sign all the articles in their original form, without any single exception, and even to confirm them by oath. Indeed, the articles were so numerous, and so restrictive, that scarce any prince could have been brought to comply with them; but this king had so repeatedly professed republican principles, that it might have been said they were framed by himself.

These affairs being settled, the coronation was conducted in the most magnificent manner; and every demonstration of joy was displayed on that occasion. He was next day waited on by the senate and the four orders of the diet, and the speech made to them by the king, was one of the most lively and animated that we meet with in history. There was, however, something of ambiguity in it; for speaking of the articles he had signed, he said, "Unhappy is that king who wants the tie of oaths to secure himself on the throne, and who, not assured of the hearts of his subjects, is constrained to reign by the laws; when he cannot by the love of his people." Such was the manner in which this prince began his reign; and what were his views will appear afterwards.

The diet still continued sitting, when those schemes that been long hatching began to reveal themselves. As it was necessary the experiment should be made at a considerable distance from the capital, in order that it might, in some degree, operate before the senate or diet should receive information of it, and might thereby acquire a considerable degree of strength, before their attempt to crush it could take place, it was resolved that it should break out where such of the military were quartered as the court could confide in.

Scania, a province in the south-west extremity of Sweden, and about two hundred and fifty miles from Stockholm, was the place pitched upon; for as that province is only separated from Denmark by the Sound, consequently great numbers of the military are constantly quartered in it. It was agreed, that the king should remain in Stockholm; that his brother, prince Charles, should set out for Christianstadt, under pretence of meeting his mother, who had been on a visit to the court of Berlin; and prince Frederick Adolphus, went into the neighbouring province of Ostragothia, which lies in the way from Stockholm, under pretence of drinking the mineral waters.

Every thing being now in as good order as possible, one Helichins, a captain of foot, having brought over his company to join him, the magazines and arms arms were seized on, and then he caused a manifesto to be published and distributed among the people to the following purport: That those persons who called themselves the states of Sweden; had not only usurped that power, but had likewise by their arbitrary proceeding brought the nation to a state of ruin: that they had entered into foreign connections without the consent of either the king or the people; and altho' the people were in a manner starving, yet no corn had been brought into the country to relieve their pressing necessities: that under pretence of promoting the good of the subjects, they had made the most oppressive taxes; that they had stripped the king of the regal power, and left him no more than an empty title; so that however willing he might be to redress their grievances, yet it was not in his power. For these reasons, and for many others that might be mentioned, they renounced all allegiance to this pretended diet, and exhorted all faithful Swedes to join with them in suppressing an order that had brought such evils upon the kingdom. They concluded, in the fashionable strain, with an appeal to heaven, of the rectitude of their motives and intentions; at the same time, begging for the divine blessing upon their undertakings.

From these particulars it will appear, that this manifesto had been first fabricated in the king's cabinet; and that Hellichins, who published it, was no more than a tool for that purpose, and had previously been instructed to act his part. The whole garrison of Christianstadt declared in favour of the manifesto, and they were soon joined by vast numbers of peasants from different parts of the country.

Prince Charles, who was then at Carellsroon, no sooner heard of the revolt, than he assembled the forces in the neighbourhood, and took upon him the command of the garrison, in which was a great magazine of arms and ammunition. He then caused a manifesto to be published, of so mysterious a nature, that no person could well know what part he intended to act. He said, he could not behold with indifference the flames of civil war breaking out in his dear native country; and therefore he was determined to suppress the insurrection, and desired that all those who wished well to their country, would follow his standard. Accordingly, having placed such a garrison in Carellsroon as he could depend on, he put himself at the head of the remainder of the troops, and began his march to Christianstadt, with several pieces of cannon. His brother prince Frederick, taking the same advantage of the insurrection, put himself at the head of the troops in Ostragothia, before any news had reached Stockholm. In the mean time general Rudbeck, who happened to be then in Ostragothia, set out for Stockholm, and having informed the senate of these proceedings, and shewn them prince Charles's manifesto, there remained no doubt what were the real intentions of the court.

As the guards were firmly attached to the king, the senate did not chuse to trust them, nor did they consult the king upon any thing. They ordered the burghers to put themselves under arms, and take their stations in different parts of the city; under the command of count Halling; who was also considered as prime minister. All this time the king seemed perfectly easy; but when the senate sent him an order to sign for recalling his brother, he refused to do it; but the refusal was not regarded, for they put both the king's seal and name to it.

Though the king seemed totally inactive with respect to these important transactions, yet it is evident that he was taking the most effectual measures to accomplish the great design he had in view; to the success of which nothing contributed so much as the secrecy and silence with which they were conducted. The Senate had sent for two regiments from Upland, and upon their arrival, the king assembled the senate, demanding to know why they had sent for troops without his consent. Upon that they, in a manner, commanded him to shew them some letters that had been sent him by his brothers? but this he refused to comply with in the most positive manner. The altercation between him and the senators grew warm; and one of them proceeded so far as to attempt to seize his sword, upon which he boldly drew it; and the senators were so much frightened, that he had an opportunity of getting out of the door, which he locked behind him, and put the key in his pocket.

Having thus cooped up the senators, he went to the guard-room, where he assembled the officers, and made a long speech to them, complaining of the miseries the people groaned under from the abuse of power in the senators, and that this cruel tyranny became every day more and more intolerable.

He told them further, that he was determined to run all hazards to get rid of of them, and asked the officers whether they would not assist their king in shaking off so ignominious a yoke, and restore the nation to its antient liberty. To this proposal the officers in general assented with great readiness, as well as the soldiers; upon which the king asked them, if they would take an oath of allegiance to him, which they as readily complied with.

Every thing being thus far conducted, the king, in consequence of a previous consultation with his friends, had a white linen handkerchief round his arm, as a signal; upon which many of the nobility and gentry flocked to him. He then put himself at the head of the guards, and seized on all the magazines, without so much as one person venturing to oppose him.

The whole garrison of Stockholm, although commanded by baron Rudbeck, who hated the king, deserted their leader, and followed the king's standard. The old baron ran with his sword drawn, thro' the streets, calling out to the people to take arms in defence of their liberties; but it was too late, for they imagined they might live as happily under one tyrant, as under five hundred.

Thus, in a large nation, a revolution was brought about without bloodshed, tumult, or the least opposition; while the people flocked together in the same inoffensive manner as if they had been going to see some holiday sports. The king then repaired to the castle, where having assembled the foreign ministers, he told them, that it was with the utmost reluctance that he had been obliged to take such a step, as would surprize all Europe; but the safety of his own person, and the security of the state, rendered it absolutely necessary. He entreated them to inform their respective courts, that his motives, when made known would justify him; and that this affair should not make the least alteration in his conduct with respect to the other European powers. The next morning all the magistrates took an oath to obey none but the king, and such of the senators or deputies who refused to take it, were committed to prison, and told, that unless they complied within one month, they must for ever depart out of the kingdom.

The following day being appointed for abolishing the old form of government, and the establishment of the new, the king ordered the states to be assembled for that purpose. Previous to this, guards had been placed round the hall of the palace, so that there was not the least doubt but his orders would be punctually obeyed. The king entered the hall in his regalia, and having made a long speech, complaining of the senate for having presumed to act as if in a legislative capacity, without power from the diet. He said, that the diet on the one hand, and the senate on the other, seemed to claim each a separate power, while he himself, though honoured with the title of king, enjoyed no more than the shadow of royalty. He concluded by telling them, that the senate had actually presumed to receive subsidies from foreign powers, whose counsels governed Sweden; but that he would now assert the honour of his crown, and promote the interests of all his loyal and peaceable subjects.

The king took a most solemn oath, by which he renounced renounced all claims to arbitrary power; after which he caused the new form of government to be read. It consisted of fifty-seven articles, but they may be all comprized in the following: that the king shall, for the future, chuse the senate, or, in other words, he should appoint to that office such as he approved of: that he shall assemble the states when he pleases, and likewise, when he pleases, dissolve their meeting, so as they have sat one time full three months: that the taxes shall be granted by the states; but if not granted within three months after their meeting, then the old ones shall be levied. In case of any sudden exigence, such as the fear of invasion, the king shall impose taxes till such time as the states can be called together: that when the states are assembled, they are not to deliberate on any thing but what the king shall cause to be laid before them: that the king shall have full power to dispose of the army and navy in whatever manner he pleases, and likewise to give away all places, either in the civil or military departments.

When all the articles were read, the king stood up, and asked the states, Whether they would give their oath to observe this form of government? As they knew that it was in vain to dispute, they all consented with one voice; after which they were immediately sworn in the king's presence, and the speakers of each order signed a bond in name of the rest.

The great work being thus finally accomplished, the king stood up, and told them, that it was necessary they should return thanks to God for bringing about so happy an event, without the effusion of human blood; and then pulling a book out of his pocket, the whole assembly joined with him in singing Te Deum, according to the custom of the Lutherans. They were then permitted to kiss his hand; after which the king departed, and the states separated, without knowing whether they were ever to meet again.

Next day, all the old senators were dismissed, and, in their room, fifteen noblemen were appointed, on whose attachment to him he could, with the most unshaken confidence, rely.

This prince was too much of a politician not to ingratiate himself with the lower class of people; and as the distresses of the poor were then very great, in order to throw the greater odium on the senate, he caused ten thousand measures of meal to be distributed among them, each measure weighing twenty pounds; which, although far from being sufficient to relieve all their wants, answered the end designed, namely, to endear himself the more to them. He also caused the diet of the states to be assembled. But now every thing seemed totally changed; for, instead of enquiring into the conduct of the king, as had been customary on former occasions, each order of the states strove who should be the first to flatter him; and every thing he asked was granted, without one dissenting voice. The supplies were granted in the most lavish manner; and a secret committee being chosen from each order of the states, to assist the senate, the king dismissed them, and they returned to their respective habitations with as much good humour as if he had been conferring with them on the most valuable privileges.

It may be considered as one of the extraordinary circumstances of this extraordinary revolution, that not a drop of blood, either by legal or military execution, was shed in the progress, or in consequence of it: a striking instance, how much the manners of mankind have been softened within a few ages; and, that whatever progress the meaner or baser qualities of the mind may have made, the more terrible ones, which proceed from cruelty and ferocity, are, in a great measure, worn out. Indeed, too much cannot be said of the extraordinary wisdom and superior abilities displayed by the king in the whole of his conduct. The profound dissimulation with which he covered his designs, by putting on the republican cloak, so as to elude the eyes of a whole nation, and to escape the vigilant attention of those whom age and experience had rendered both cautious and suspicions, cannot be paralleled in history, especially when we consider that it was performed by one so young. He never seemed irritated by any passion, but solidity regulated his judgment, and prudence directed his hands.

While the king of Sweden was displaying the greatest abilities in setting up a new form of government, the state of public affairs in Denmark assumed a new face. The king had, for some time, made choice of one favourite after another; but scarcely had any of them gained a share of his friendship and confidence, than they were discarded with peculiar marks of disgrace. Great hopes had been formed of this prince when he ascended the throne, and as great disappointments followed; for the king, who governs his subjects by the advice of foreigners, can never be popular in his own dominions; and, without the love of the people, sovereignty is but an odious name.

Among others who, like needy adventurers, came to settle in Copenhagen, was one Strunsee, the son of a Lutheran minister in Holstein. He was a young man of the most insinuating address, with some very good abilities, but profligate in his manners, and abandoned to every vice, not paying the least regard to the most sacred obligations, and treating religion with contempt.

It is amazing to consider the rapid progress which this adventurer, and one Brandt, his companion, made by their insinuating address. They were both raised to the dignity of noblemen; and Strunsee was made prime minister, a circumstance which could not fail of raising an honest indignation in the minds of the Danish nobility. By his advice, accompanied with that of his friend Brandt, all the old faithful counsellors were disgraced and banished; till at last the two favourites, grown giddy with power, could set no bounds to their madness, but even treated the king with contempt.

It cannot be supposed that the subjects of any kingdom, even the most despotic, could bear long with such insolence. To have done so, would have been a disgrace to them as men, and remained a striking proof, that they were unworthy of a place in human society. Accordingly a conspiracy was formed, and, to give it the greater sanction, the queen-dowager, second wife of the late king, was at the head of it. Every thing being ripe for execution, a masked ball was given at court on the sixteenth of January, and, as soon as it was over, the king, who seemed to labour under great weakness of mind, retired to rest. He had not, however, been long in bed, when the principal conspirators came into his chamber, and told him, that the reigning queen, with Strunsee and Brandt, were that instant employed in drawing up a paper, which they would force him to sign; the contents of which were, that he was to renounce the crown. The queen-dowager told him, that there was no way of saving himself, but by signing an order to take into custody the reigning queen, with the two odious favourites; and the poor weak prince, overcome by fear, readily complied. The warrant was immediately executed, and the queen, with the two favourites, were committed to different prisons. The queen was afterwards sent to the castle of Cronenburg, where she remained some time very closely confined, but, by the interposition of her royal brother, the king of Great-Britain, she was set at liberty, and suffered to reside at Zell, in the electorate of Hanover, with a pension equal to her dignity.

But the fate of the two favourites was otherwise determined. They were confined in close dungeons, and not allowed any thing to subsist on but bread and water, nor were their beards suffered to be shaved. They were examined from time to time during the space of two months, and threatened with being put to the torture, unless they made an open confession. At last sentence of death was passed upon them, that they should have their right hands cut off, and then their their heads; and that, after their quarters had been exposed on the wheel, they should be placed on the most conspicuous parts in the city. Accordingly, this sentence was executed, in all its rigour, on the twenty-eighth day of April, on a scaffold near the city, in the midst of a vast concourse of people. They both behaved with greater decency and resignation than might have been expected from men who had lived as they did. Strunsee in particular was extremely penitent, and prayed very devoutly with the minister who attended him. Such was the end of two men, who might have been ornamental members of society, had they not aspired to power which they had not proper abilities to manage.

On the twenty-sixth day of November, the parliament met; and his majesty, in his speech from the throne, informed the members, that his reason for calling them so soon, was to take into their consideration some things of the utmost importance. He told them, that he had been informed, from the most undoubted authority, that the East-India Company was in a most distressed condition; and that, as many of his good subjects had their fortunes depending on the credit of that company, therefore its security was now become a national concern. He desired them to take it into their immediate consideration, and, if possible, lay down some rational plan; by which the interest and honour of the company might be restored; and every thing settled on the most permanent footing. He took notice, that he had the strongest assurances from the powers on the continent, that the peace of Europe would not be any farther disturbed than so far as the war was carried on between the Turks and Russians. He concluded by recommending to them the most prudent methods that could be made use of, in order to reduce the price of provisions, as the distresses of the poor were not imaginary, but real; and that nothing would give him greater pleasure, than to hear that those distresses were alleviated.

As soon as the commons returned to their own house, Mr. Fitzpatrick, brother to the earl of Offory, moved, that a loyal address should be presented to his majesty, and introduced the motion with the following remarks. He said, that the affairs of the East-India Company were in the most alarming and ruinous condition: that the immediate interposition of parliament was become highly indispensable to their preservation: that, in 1769, the company had agreed with the government to pay the sum of four thousand pounds at every time when their dividend amounted to twelve per cent. and so on in proportion till it fell to six, when that payment was to cease: that this being the case, and the present distressed state of the company so notorious, it would be necessary to make some provision adequate to the deficiency: that, so far from the company's being able to make a dividend of either twelve or six per cent. at the end of the next half year, it would be an act of the highest fraud in the directors to divide a single shilling. Some of the members opposed the address; but the vote being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very great majority, and presented accordingly.

The first thing of importance which came under the consideration of the house of commons, was the present state of the navy, and this occasioned very warm debates. The objections made by those in opposition were to the following import. They said, that the number of seamen was too great to be kept up in time of profound peace; and that we were at peace with all our neighbours, was declared in the speech from the throne. It was further urged, that the ministry had not given in an account in what manner the supplies granted last year had been used, so that the house was left quite in the dark.

The ministry, on the other hand, had but little to say; only that they urged the necessity of keeping our navy on the most respectable footing; and set forth, that our fleet in the East-Indies was now much greater than formerly. Those in opposition said, that when the public granted money, they had a right to enquire in what manner it was to be laid out, that the utmost satisfaction ought to be given to those who contributed towards supporting the dignity of government: that some of those employed in the building of ships for the royal navy, had added to them some very extraordinary decorations, which, although wholly unnecessary, had been attended with great expence. It was added, that the slow payment of the navy bills was a great hardship to those who advanced money on the credit of them; that such an abuse ought to be redressed before any farther supplies were granted: that it was very surprising, that, after the declaration from the throne, that we were in the most profound state of peace; as many men should be asked for as if we were at war with the most formidable power in Europe.

Upon the whole, the arguments were carried on with great heat by those in opposition; and certainly nothing could be more reasonable than to lay before the people a state of the public affairs, that they might be satisfied whether their money had been laid out in promoting the purposes for which it was given. It was asked, If a naval force must be kept up in the East-Indies, what end was it to answer? Had we any enemy to oppose in that part of the world; and if so, who was that enemy? What armament had been sent into those seas to disturb our settlements, or harass our trade? It was further asked, in an ironical manner, Whether the Chinese had fitted out a fleet, whether we had any pirates to contend with, and whether the ghost of the famous Angria had made its appearance on the theatre of this world? If no answer could be made to these questions; if no reason could be assigned for keeping up such a strong naval force, then the motion ought to be rejected, and no money granted for that purpose, seeing there was no reason for it, unless it was to burthen the people with unnecessary taxes. But, notwithstanding the force of these arguments, no sooner was the question put, than it was carried for the ministry by a great majority, and the supplies were granted.

A motion was then made to enquire into the nature of those causes which occasioned the dearth of all sorts of provisions, but nothing was done that could be of any real service to the public. Several regulations, indeed, were made with respect to bread, and some restrictions laid upon the bakers; but, unless the rents of landed estates and farms can be lowered, by the retrenchment of different species of luxury, the legislature itself will never be able to remedy the evils complained of. To redress any grievances, nothing can be more proper, nothing more salutary, than to begin with the effects, and trace them up to the original causes from whence they spring. In vain does the legislative power lay the inferior order of tradesmen under some sort of restrictions, when, at the same time, it is well known that, unless the causes are removed, the effects must remain in the same state as before. Most of those who compose our houses of parliament are landholders; and if they know that the rents of their farms are double to what they were twenty years ago, consequently, the prices of all sorts of provisions must rise in proportion.

A secret committee having been appointed to enquire into the state of the East-India company's affairs, it was found, by their report, that the affairs of the company were both perplexed, and very much distressed. It was therefore proposed, that supervisors should be sent out to the East-Indies, to make a proper enquiry how far the officers and servants belonging to the company had abused the trust reposed in them, and to have power to grant redress to all those who thought themselves in the least injured. Some of the members whose fortunes lay in the East-India stock, made strong objections to this bill, while those who supported it retorted upon them, by declaring, that nothing but oppression had been carried on in that part of the world; and as the company had, either directly or indirectly, encouraged such practices, it was now high time to call them to an account for their conduct, and prevent them, for the future, from acting in such a manner as could serve no other end besides that of disgracing themselves, and bringing a real dishonour upon the nation. At last the motion was carried in the usual manner; and supervisors were appointed, with plenary powers to make a proper enquiry into all the abuses complained of, and to rectify them as far as lay in their power.

A motion was next made to enquire into the state of the army; and particularly, whether it was necessary that we should, in times of peace, keep up such a strong military force as seemed of no other use but to impoverish the nation, and to be ready at all times to support the arbitrary dictates of a minister. It was said by those who promoted the motion, that the national militia was at all times able to preserve us from our enemies at home; and as for such settlements as we had abroad, a very small force was sufficient, especially as we were not engaged in a war with any of the powers on the continent. In answer to this, the ministry said, that all other European nations kept up standing armies, and therefore it was, in a manner, necessary that we should do the same, otherwise, if a war was to break out, we should be utterly unprepared, and, consequently, we should be exposed to many unforeseen dangers.

A.D. 1773. The holidays being ended, the parliament met pursuant to their last adjournment, and took into consideration the acts relating to penalties inflicted on those who infringed the laws respecting the preservation of the game. This subject is of the utmost importance to the inhabitants of a free country, and therefore it was discussed both upon natural and municipal principles. It is certain that every thing which seems to have an existence upon natural principles, will at all times attract the notice of the public; and such as may, probably, have no concern in the dispute, will, notwithstanding, interest themselves in it. Thus a wild beast in the fields has been, time immemorial, considered as the property of the public; and if either its flesh or skin were of any value, then the person who took or killed it was to consider it as his own. In proof of this, it may be added, that some of the Anglo-Saxon kings remitted the tax which the Welsh used to pay, upon condition that they produced a certain number of wolves heads, by which means that destructive species of animals was eradicated out of the country.

On the other hand, it was urged, that whatever might be the privileges belonging to men in a state of nature, they were all cancelled as soon as civil society took place: that all municipal laws were made for the good of society, and in the preamble to every act, reasons were assigned for the conduct of the legislative power. One reason, indeed, was declared to be unanswerable, and that was, that in a commercial nation, where every person is supposed to get his living by honest industry, gaming in general ought to be laid under the severest restrictions: that poaching, or killing of game, led the lower order of people away from their lawful employments; and while they were spending their time in taking a hare or a fox, their families were left to starve: that although the laws made for the preservation of the game might seem to interfere with private property, yet they were such as would stand warranted by good sense and sober reason. Nothing, however, was done on this subject; and we are sorry to say, that those who pretended to stand up for the natural rights of mankind, were such as had, in the opinion of the public, trampled on some of the most sacred moral obligations. The ministry promoted the bill, in order to acquire some share of popularity; the patriots opposed it for the sake of opposition. It was then moved in the house, that a bill should be brought in to enable foreigners to lend money on the credit of some of our West-India settlements; and the reason for this motion was, that many foreigners who had money to lend on real security, would be glad to lay it out in that manner, if they could only have it in their power to recover their debts according to the common-law of England. It was further urged, that such a practice would, in a great measure, reduce the price of sugar, and, at the same time, our colonies would become more respectable than ever. That the interest of the colonies and the mother-country were reciprocal; there was no line to be drawn between them, because they must stand or fall together; they were links of the same chain, wheels of the same machine; and no sooner was one decomposed, than all the rest went into a state of confusion.

Some disorders having happened in the West-Indies, a committee was appointed to make a proper enquiry into the causes, and to report to the house, whether the things complained of originated from the arbitrary proceedings of the governors, or the refractory conduct of the people. The ministry did all they could to support this enquiry, but, after the committee had examined a great number of witnesses, no satisfactory account could be obtained, and things stood on the same footing as before.

Monopolies, the curse of every commercial state, came next before the house; and the principal question agitated was, whether those engaged in partnership should be obliged to part with their real estates, in order to satisfy the demands which their creditors had upon them, in consequence of a commercial copartnership. One would think that nothing can be more equitable than that of a man's giving up his all for the benefit of his creditors, notwithstanding any connections he may happen to have; but notwithstanding, the motion was violently opposed, and there is reason to fear that such a beneficial institution will not take place in the present age.

An affair of great importance now came on before the house, which, had it been properly attended to, would, in a great measure, have restored the constitution of this country to its original principles. The question was as follows, Whether it is not consistent with the constitution of this country, that every session of parliament should be itself a real parliament, that the people might have an opportunity, from time to time, to send such persons to represent them as should seem worthy of their choice.

This naturally leads us to take some view of the ancient parliaments of this and other European nations, who rose on the ruins of the Roman empire.

As the people are the fountain of power, and as the rights which princes enjoy are no more than delegated, therefore it is no more than reasonable that the people should be represented. This representation was originally the right of all those who chose to act for their neighbours; but, in time, it was found so burthensome, that four shillings per day for knights of the shires, and two shillings for burgesses, was allowed to all those who gave due attention to the affairs of parliament. Parliaments were called as often as the sovereign thought proper; but prorogation and dissolution seem to have been synonymous terms till the reign of Henry VI. when the unhappy wars between the houses of York and Lancaster took place. From that time till the succession of queen Elizabeth, there seems to have been no fixed rule, till we come to the revolution, when it was ordered that a new parliament should be summoned to meet once in three years, and to continue during the whole of that time, either by sitting or prorogation. This was an attempt towards political reformation, and, perhaps, as much as could have been then effected, consistent with the state of public affairs; but still it called for amendment. No man is infallible, and it is well known that there are but few who can withstand the force of a bribe. This has at all times given wicked ministers the power of trampling on the rights of their country, by bringing over a majority to be, as it were, a standing council. But however great the evils evils might be which arose from triennial parliaments, they were trifling when compared with those which we shall now mention.

When the rebellion, which broke out in 1715, was quelled, the ministry, for reasons now unknown to us, resolved to take a cruel revenge. Many unhappy wretches were executed; and, had it not been for the natural humanity of the people, thousands more would have shared the same fate. The ministry were so sensible of the general discontents of the people, that, in order to screen themselves from the effects of a parliamentary enquiry, a bill was brought in to make the then parliament to continue seven years, and the same rule was to take place in all future elections. Perhaps this was the first blow struck at the root of our most excellent constitution, and the evils arising from it have been felt by all ranks of people in the nation.

To remedy those evils, and, if possible, give the people leave to make a free choice as often as possible, a worthy patriot made a motion, that a bill might be brought in to shorten the duration of parliaments. This was what every honest man wished for, because, where the time or continuance of office is short, the temptation must be small. Reasonable, however, as this motion was, there was a strong majority against it; and, to the surprize of all those who wished well to the constitution, it was thrown out. Future ages will be surprized, when they read, that, in this age, such an equitable motion should be rejected by those who profess themselves the guardians of the rights of their fellow-subjects; but it is too true to be denied; and, till such time as parliaments revert back to their original form, the people may complain without effect. In vain are they indulged in their choice, if the least restriction is laid upon it; for freedom in common life is but one link of that chain which cements all the bodies in political society.

It is certain that many patriots are still to be found in this country; and although some of their schemes may happen to be overthrown, they ought to be held in the highest esteem by all those who wish well to their natural rights and privileges. Lord Howe moved, that a bill might be brought in to enable his majesty to augment the pay of the naval officers, which, at that time, was too small for their subsistence. This motion was supported by all those who wished well to the brave men, who undergo ten thousand hardships which others never feel. But still it was opposed by the ministry; for although the petition delivered by lord Howe, in name of the naval officers, was conceived in the most modest terms, yet such was the malevolence of those in office, that no regard was paid to it. It was said, that the nation could not afford them any more; so that whatever their merits might be; yet, when it was considered that there was an utter impossibility of complying with their request, they ought to rest satisfied.

Indeed, the arguments made use of by those who contended for so equitable an act, were far superior to those made use of on the other side; and we will venture to affirm, that the hardships suffered by naval officers are of such a nature, that no rewards can be too great for them. Were but a few of the articles of luxury taken away, and, in room thereof, the same money given to reward and encourage those brave men, who venture their lives for our safety, the nation would receive an additional honour.

A motion was then made, that the house should resolve itself into a committee, to enquire into the propriety of foreigners being connected in our trade to any parts of the world, exclusive of Europe. This motion took its rise from the following causes, namely, the power granted to the lords of the admiralty to stop all ships which are not wholly the property of British subjects. It was proved, by the evidence of several witnesses, that some ships had been detained at Gravesend a whole month, for no other reason, but because part of the cargoes belonged to foreign merchants. The result of all this was, that leave was given to bring in a bill to remedy the evil complained of.

It is a maxim in the law of nature, that justice should be freely administered at the expence of the whole community, because it is supposed to be done for the preservation of the whole; and it will often happen, especially in large communities, that an innocent person may be accused of crimes, thrown into a prison, and brought to a public trial. It is true, he may, from a variety of circumstances, be able to prove his own innocence; yet, when the jury has acquitted him, he cannot be discharged, in many parts of England, till such time as he has paid certain fees to the gaoler. Long, indeed, had this practice been a disgrace to the nation, till, about forty years ago, the city of London, at the instance of baron Thompson, their recorder, set the example, of discharging every prisoner, without fees, as soon as he was acquitted by the jury. The noble generosity of the citizens of London was not, however, adopted by those who lived in more distant counties. No provision was made to defray the expences of keeping the felons in prison; so that instances were produced of some poor men lying a whole year in gaol, because they could not pay their fees. To remedy an evil of so glaring a nature, a bill was brought in to oblige every county to make good all the deficiencies incurred to the gaolers by keeping the prisoners. To the honour of the present age, let it be here remembered, that a bill, formed by the heart of charity, and supported by benevolence, passed with the almost unanimous consent of the house. In consequence of this humane resolution, the prisoner who is now acquitted must be discharged without paying any fees. The verdict of the jury shall make him as free as if he had never been in prison; he may go from the bar to his own family without being called in question, or detained for any fees whatever; his imprisonment being considered as a great punishment after his innocence has been proved.

We have already taken notice, that both churchmen and dissenters had applied to parliament for some relief in the article of subscription; and although their request was rejected at that time, yet they both renewed it afterwards. To a liberal and enlarged mind, it will appear, that there can be no medium in this affair between the churchmen and the dissenters. Dr. Tucker, dean of Gloucester, has written a treatise, wherein he proves, that all bodies or societies, whether political or religious, have a right to impose some tie on those who join with them. Now this applies to the established church of England, which, as a national institution, has heaped emoluments on its ministers, and, consequently, has a right to impose some test by which their orthodoxy may be known. It is different with respect to the dissenters; they do not enjoy any of those emoluments, nor can they be admit ed to execute the duties of a civil office till they have taken the sacramental test. These considerations weighed strongly with the house, and a bill to relieve the dissenters actually passed by a great majority; but, when sent up to the lords, it met with a warm opposition, and, in the end, was rejected.

The state of the linen trade was the next object that attracted the notice of the house, and, undoubtedly, it is a subject which requires the utmost attention. In the manufactures of linen, not only men and women, but even children, are employed; and it may, with the utmost propriety, be said to be the staple commodity both of Ireland and Scotland. In both places, this useful art has been brought to great perfection; thousands of useful subjects are employed in it, and therefore any thing to promote or injure it becomes a national concern. But, notwithstanding the vast advantages arising to the community from this branch of trade, it seems to suffer in common with every thing else. The reason is obvious to any thinking person; for as the poor are, in general, employed in the different branches of that manufacture, so it is necessary that provisions should be cheap, in order order that our merchants may be able to sell their goods at foreign markets, at a lower price than our neighbours. But the present increase of luxury has induced our nobility and gentry to raise the rents of their estates, and, consequently, the necessary provisions have been enlarged in price at the same time, so that the poor could not live by the prices of their labour.

The importation of foreign linen was much insisted on by those who had the interest of their country at heart; and several proposals were made, that no foreign linen should be imported. Perhaps no measure could have been more productive of the public good; but the great misfortune was, that the foreign linens were charged a certain duty, unless some scheme could be proposed to make good the deficiency that would occur in the public imports; so that the motion was, for that time, thrown out.

With respect to the state of affairs on the continent, particularly in Poland, and near the Danube, nothing decisive happened during the whole of this year. Many different engagements happened, indeed, between the Turks and the Russians, but both parties continued still in such an uncertain state, that they were obliged to act on the defensive. Some proposals, indeed, were made by both parties, towards bringing about a lasting peace, but nothing was done, for the Russians were high in their demands, and the Turks were too proud to comply. The king of Prussia, that great politician and general, to whom even rest is painful, proposed, that the wretched kingdom of Poland should be divided into three parts, in the following manner. That vast, extensive tract of land, reaching from the Boristhenes to Muscovy, was to be ceded to the empress of Russia; the emperor of Germany was to have the southern parts of Great Poland, from Warsaw to Cracovia, and from thence to the confines of Hungary. All that part of Poland which reaches from Warsaw along the Oder and Vistula to Dantzick, and afterwards along the coast of the Baltic Sea, were to be given to the king of Prussia. Thus a nation, one of the most fertile in Europe, after being torn in pieces by intestine divisions, was to become the property of three mighty sovereigns who had no right to it besides that of lawless power. The great object the artful king of Prussia had in view, was to seize the opulent town of Dantzick, in order to open a trade to Petersburg through the Sound, and to all the other mercantile states in Europe. This was one of the boldest strokes that could have been struck; but in all things the king of Prussia is such a master in politics, as well as the art of war, that nothing seems too difficult for him; the universe itself is not capable of setting bounds to his ambition, although his advanced years seem to threaten a decay of nature.

During the whole of this year, vast numbers of people emigrated from Scotland, and the north of England, to settle in America. To to an ingenious, rational, thinking person, this emigration of the people from the mother-country to the colonies, must have the most alarming aspect. It is an indication of the approaching ruin of a state; and nothing is more necessary, than that those in power should make a proper enquiry into the sources from whence such mischiefs flow. It is a certain fact, that the madness of raising the rents of small farms has reached even to the barren mountains of the highlands of Scotland; and, unless some stop is put to it, the consequences will prove very fatal at last. It is not reasonable to suppose, that people who work hard for a subsistence, will give more money, as the rents of an estate or farm, than the fruits of the earth will pay. What man in his right senses would run himself into debt to his landlord, while, at the same time, he is under an indispensable obligation of making a proper provision for his family? It is an indifferent matter to people where they thrive, whether in America or England; and it is certain, that in both places the same effects may be produced. This, however, may be said in favour of the emigrants, that they act as rational creatures: they are oppressed in the most cruel manner by those landlords whose subsistence depends on their honest industry: they cultivate the ground with the utmost care; they think to bring up their children useful members of society; but no sooner do they reap the fruits of the earth, from which they expect an adequate reward, than they find that even that property which they laid out is swallowed, and nothing is left for themselves. Can they then be blamed for leaving that country which denies them the protection which every subject has a right to expect? There cannot, in the eye of humanity, be one reason urged against those emigrations, nor can tyranny itself prevent them, unless all natural obligations are to be trampled on. The thing itself, however, ought to be attended to by those who are proprietors of landed estates; for if the useful working people are thus to be driven out of the country, where are hands to be found to cultivate the ground? This may, in the end, render their estates of no manner of service, and that ground which might have been cultivated at a moderate price will become a desert.

In France, nothing of any importance happened this year. The people in that extensive country are so well accustomed to those chains of slavery first imposed upon them by Lewis XI. that no oppression seems too much for them to bear. The Spaniards continued to go on in their usual indolent manner, while the Dutch continued to be the drudges of all those who would employ them.

In Italy, the pope put a final end to the order of the Jesuits; and those fathers, who have so long domineered over the consciences of men, are now become so truly despicable, that all nations have refused them an asylum, except the king of Prussia, who has, at all times, made religion subservient to politics.

A. D. 1774. We have already seen in what a troubled condition our colonies were; and, now they seem to be drawing towards that crisis, which will either connect them with the mother-country, or create such disturbances as will not be easily redressed.

The parliament met on the twenty-fifth of January, and the king, in his speech from the throne, recommended to them to take into their serious consideration the state of the colonies, who seemed to be attempting to throw off all subjection to the British government. He told them, that the most salutary laws had been treated with contempt; and public acts of parliament had been despised, as if they had been the mandates of single persons: that the colonies were little better than in a state of rebellion; and that, unless some vigorous measures were used to force them to obedience, all laws would be trampled under foot, and the regularity which took place among the different ranks of beings, would once more return to its original state of confusion. He concluded by recommending to them the state of the gold coin, which had suffered much by the illicit practices of wicked persons, and hoped they would put it on a solid foundation.

When the commons had returned to their own house, strong debates ensued upon the words of the address which should be presented to his majesty. Those in the interest of the court insisted, that an implicit acknowledgment should be made, thanking his majesty for his paternal care of the nation, and to promise that every reasonable measure should be complied with. On the other hand, it was urged by those in opposition, that the colonies, so far from being in a state of rebellion, were only contending for the enjoyment of those rights and privileges which belong to all men in common as members of society: that the mother-country had no right to tax those emigrants, unless a consent to that measure was first had and obtained from their own representatives: that the colonies were not regularly, nor in any sense whatever represented in the British parliament; and therefore, therefore, till such time as that legal representation took place, no taxes could, in justice, be imposed upon them. As to the affair of the gold coin, it was (said they) a great hardship to the honest, industrious trading part of the nation; and that the ministry ought, before any thing of that nature had been proposed, to have laid down some rational plan by which the public would have been indemnified. Such were the outlines of the arguments made use of by both parties; but the question being put to the vote, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the court.

The grand object which the government had in view, was to reduce the colonies to a state of obedience, and convince them of the necessity they were under of being subject to the mother-country; and therefore a bill was brought in of a very coercive nature. Some persons in the town of Boston had plundered a ship which was sent from England with tea; and as this was an act which infringed on private property, it called aloud for an exertion of the regal power. Accordingly an act passed to remove the customs from the town of Boston, to quarter a military force upon the people, and to block up their harbour by several ships of war. It is not yet certain what will be the effects of this act, but it is to be hoped that all these disputes between the mother-country and the colonies will subside, and unanimity take place.

Many important affairs were discussed during this session of parliament; particularly one for the regulation of all acts by which foreigners are to be naturalized. The freedom of this country is so great and uncircumscribed, that many bad uses have been made of it by designing persons. To remedy an evil attended with so many destructive consequences, a new law has been established, by which no foreigner who is naturalized shall enjoy the privileges of a British subject, unless he resides in the country. The gold coin has also been attended to with the strictest care, and there is reason to hope that, in a short time, all the evils complained of will be redressed. Affairs of so much importance can have no connection with any party whatever, and, so far as they are promoted for the general good, they become of service to the whole. Every thing by which the public is likely to be affected, ought to attract the notice of government; and where remedies can be found out, they ought to be applied. But here we are naturally led to take a view of such transactions as have taken place on the continent of Europe during the beginning of this year.

When the war began between the Turks and Russians, Europe in general was filled with a notion that it would have soon terminated in favour of the latter; but those who are conversant with history, and acquainted with the revolutions which took place in this lower world, will not pay much regard to such a conjecture. That the Turks were but little acquainted with the art of war when the Russians first opposed them, is certain; but still, it would be very improper to infer from thence, that they must always remain in the same state of ignorance. Necessity brings hidden principles to life; and sometimes it will happen, that the most illiterate barbarians will, in consequence of opposition, acquire knowledge of what they despised before. This was the case with the Turks, who, in the grossest sense of the word, being slaves to superstition, could not bear the thoughts of receding from their ancient customs. Their janizaries declared, that as their country had been first conquered by their sabres, therefore they would defend it by the same means. But nothing in the world could be more ridiculous, especially as they had fire-arms to encounter; and therefore it was necessary that some blow should be struck at the root of their prejudices.

The French, ever willing to take part with the enemies of Great-Britain, and, at the same time, fearful lest, in consequence of the Turks being driven out of Europe, the house of Austria would become too formidable, and Russia would penetrate into the German empire, sent several of their most experienced officers to instruct the Turks in the art of war. Continual opposition made these barbarians wiser than before; they saw the absolute necessity they were under of having recourse to military discipline, and the regular order of the Russians enabled them to take the field in a much better manner than they had hitherto done. From this circumstance alone we may naturally infer, that the longer the war continues between these contending powers, the more able the Turks will be to oppose the Russians. Indeed, the climate bears hard against the latter; for it cannot be supposed, that men brought up in the cold deserts of Russia can relish the sweets of a warmer climate, without being reduced to a state of effeminacy. Thus we find that the climate of ancient Greece, the now-seat of war, has fought more strongly against the Russians than the army of the Turks; nor is this to be wondered at, when we consider that Greece has often enervated those who conquered it.

Nor was it better with the Russian fleet; for although the sailors were kept under the strictest discipline, and had been inured to many hardships, yet no sooner did they come into the Mediterranean sea, than they were seized with many diseases to which they had hitherto been strangers. Reinforcements, indeed, have been sent them from time to time; but still they have never done any thing of real importance, nor have they been able to second the operations of the army by land. The Italian states have still remained jealous of them, and the distance from their own country has prevented them from receiving the necessary supplies. There is no doubt but the Russians will, in time, become as expert seamen as any other in Europe, but still it requires some time before that can be brought about. Their best officers are not natives of the country, and, consequently, it cannot be supposed that they will wish to promote its interest in the same manner as if they were immediately connected. Their naval discipline has also some remains of barbarity in it, which, at all times, must give offence to a generous mind; for what man would desire to see his fellow creature punished in such a manner as is shocking to humanity?

Such, for some time, has been the state of affairs between the Turks and Russians, and there is reason to imagine that both the contending parties will end where they began; that the Russians will exhaust their treasures to carry on the war, but the Turks, in consequence of their internal resources, will be able to tire them out.

It is true, the Russians have made some bold attempts, since the commencement of the present year, in order to force their way towards Constantinople; but that appears in a chimerical light, especially as both the season and the climate war against them. Had the European princes considered their own interest, they would all have joined in supporting the Russians in the present war; because, in consequence of the Turks being driven out of Europe, the whole trade of the Mediterranean would have been laid open to them, and the haughty Ottomans, who have so long domineered over their neighbours, would have been forced to acquiesce in that simple proposition, that there is such a thing as the law of nations, by which all civil societies ought to be regulated, and by which every individual ought to make his proper claims.

The British ministry have been very active in providing for the safety of our fellow subjects who are settled, or have business to transact in the East-Indies. It had been long complained of, that the servants of the company, at their principal settlements, had acted in a very oppressive and illegal manner, nor indeed had any code of laws been made for their security. The vast distance from England rendered it difficult, and almost impossible, for any person to obtain redress. It was therefore resolved on in council, that four gentlemen learned in the laws; and of the most approved integrity, should be sent over to Asia, where we have settlements; and act there as judges. They are to hold pleas of the crown; determine in real, mixed and personal actions; to give judgment in all cases of equity, in every thing relating to the revenue, so that their power includes all that is lodged in the courts of Westminster-hall; but as the settlements are distant from each other, so the courts are not to be fixed, but to move from one place to another, that justice may be equally distributed to all ranks of people.

It is, perhaps, impossible to prevent abuses, unless nature itself could be changed; but certainly the government could have done no more for the good of our subjects in India, than that of sending out judges. It will serve to give some respect to the laws, and impress mens minds with a reverence for justice. The salaries of the judges being very large, it will set them above temptation to corrupt actions; and their authority extending over all ranks of persons, the rich will not have it in their power to oppress the poor.

But the greatest parliamentary business was, the manner in which the supplies was to be raised; and it must be acknowledged that the minister, whatever may be his other qualities, discovered himself to be an able politician, and a perfect master of calculations.

On the tenth of May the French king departed this life, and was succeeded by the present king, his grandson, a young prince about twenty years of age, married to one of the sisters of the emperor of Germany. The late king was born January 15, 1710, and in 1715 succeeded his great grandfather, his own father, grandfather, several uncles and brothers having all died of the small-pox. As he was only five years of age when he was crowned, his uncle the duke of Orleans was, as first prince of the blood, appointed regent during his minority. But the king took the reins of government upon himself when he was little more than sixteen years of age, having previously married the only daughter of the good Stanislaus, once king of Poland, and afterwards duke of Lorraine. His great minister for some years was the cardinal Fleury, a man who had acquired all the knowledge of courts that could be obtained in a close attendance to business above sixty years; but when he died, the king resolved to govern as much as possible without the assistance of favourites.

We have already seen that he carried on two bloody and expensive wars against Britain; in one of which he was very successful; but in the other, namely, the last, his nation, army, and navy were, in a manner, totally ruined. In his person Lewis XV. was extremely handsome, and had a most engaging countenance. In attending on public business, he was very regular; but he has been blamed for too strong an attachment to the army. This, however, ought to be considered as the reigning taste of France, and not solely the foible of the sovereign. The French have never yet, in the midst of all their refinements, been able to divest themselves of that barbarous notion which was so much cherished in former times, to look upon no person as honourable, who was not a soldier. In his pleasures, the late

French king has been much censured; because it generally happened that his mistresses got the ascendancy so far over him, as to occasion several changes in the government, merely by their intrigues.

As great pains had been taken to give him a good education, he was even to the last a lover of learning and learned men. He had such elevated notions of the necessity of a toleration in religious matters, that the power of the church of Rome has fallen into great contempt during his reign. Two reasons, indeed, concurred towards preventing him from following his own inclinations in giving free liberty of conscience to his protestant subjects. The first was, the inveterate prejudices of the vulgar nourished by the clergy; and the second, the wretched bigotry of his son the dauphin. In a word, Lewis XV. was one of the most brilliant sovereigns that has appeared in Europe during the present century; and although some of his acts to his subjects were of a very arbitrary and oppressive nature, yet he was beloved by them. He has left his successor a large fertile kingdom, with able ministers to assist him; but the commerce of France is in a most wretched condition; not does it appear that it will be otherwise, while they keep up such a large standing army.

We have, from time to time, in the course of this work, taken notice of the progress of learning in Britain; but the present age exceeds all others. The encouragement given to the fine arts by our sovereign George III. has brought to light many new discoveries. An attempt has been made to discover a passage by the north pole; but the prodigious shoals and mountains of ice in those seas rendered the scheme abortive; nor does it appear that even it will be practicable, for if such a passage would be attended with great danger, it is not worth the searching after.

In 1768, Mr. Banks, an ingenious young gentleman, and Dr. Solander, a native of Sweden, who had studied under the great Linnæus, undertook a voyage to the South Seas, under the protection of government. They traversed seas and visited islands almost unknown before, and although no beneficial consequences have yet resulted from their discoveries, there is no doubt but others will improve upon them. The same gentlemen have since made a voyage to the North Seas, and visited Iceland, a place though belonging to the king of Denmark, yet but very little known.

His majesty has added several new professorships to some of the public universities; men of learning have had pensions settled upon them adequate to their merit. Upon the whole the age of George III. has been marked with some striking events. More works of merit in the literary world have made their appearance than in any former reign, and the free access that gentlemen have to the books and records in the British Museum has given history an additional lustre, for nothing is now offered to the public without positive proofs. The literary world has sustained a great loss in the united deaths of Lord Lyttleton, Dr. Goldsmith and Dr. Gregory; but it is to be hoped that the deficiency will be made up by some of the rising generation; for as no minds are more susceptible of impressions than those of our youth, so no nation has ever produced greater men.
